Film Quality

Quality in the film—quality from a technical photographic standpoint is as important to the Exhibitor as is interest in the story that the film tells.

There's one film that's recognized the world over as the standard of quality—that is always used by those whose effort it is to give the Exhibitors the very best goods and the very best service—Eastman film.

And it is identifiable. Look for "Eastman" on the perforated margin.

THE VAMPIRE'S TOWER (2 parts—Jan. 24).—This story takes us back to the time of the French Revolution. Raymond, a lieutenant in the army disgusted with the horrors of the revolution, organizes a revolt and informs Sparon, his father owner of the "Chat Noir," that his men would meet that night in the inn to make preparations for the insurrection. Their conversation is overheard by Peter, the late executioner of Paris, who being avoided by every one, has taken up his abode in the deserted Vampire's Tower, which had a secret passage leading direct to the inn. Peter returns to his dwelling-place and while searching through the tower discovers the great hidden treasures of the Abbey. One day he meets Fornarina. He gives her some of the valuable jewels he had found, and these she gladly accepts.

The time for the meeting has arrived and Raymond and his followers set out for the inn, unaware that two spies of the "Terror" were following them. In the name of his people Raymond places his signature to an oath that they would annihilate and destroy the government of the "Terror." The executioner, having seen the spies and being averse to the revolutionary government, quickly makes for the inn and saves the conspirators by means of the secret passage just as the spies and a small army enter the room. On his way through the passage Raymond drops the note which contains his signature to the oath. And now it is in the hands of the executioner. About a month later Peter discovers that Fornarina is in love with Raymond and swears to avenge himself, remembering that he is in possession of a compromising paper. Going to the "Terror's" court of justice, he denounces Raymond as a conspirator and demands that he be his executioner.

Raymond and Fornarina are just returning from their marriage amidst the joyful greetings of their friends, when he is put under arrest and torn from the arms of his young bride. It is some time later. Raymond is brought to trial and sentenced to death, and it is then that Fornarina learns his executioner would be the man who pretended to love her. She goes to the Tower and pleads for the life of Raymond, promising to marry Peter if he would save him. Peter leaves her in his room while he goes to the prison to free his rival. Fornarina waits for his return in deep anguish. He comes back ready to claim his reward, but the broken-hearted girl desires a proof that Raymond is safe. Peter takes her to a high cliff projecting from the side of the Tower. Yes, Raymond was sailing away toward England, and they wave their last good-bye. She turns around and sees Peter waiting with outstretched arms. Preferring death to the man who had blighted her young life, she throws herself over the cliff into the deep water below.

MOTHERHOOD OR POLITICS? (Hepworth—2 parts—Jan. 19).—The suffragettes are carrying on a strenuous campaign, and the lives of one couple in particular, and their child, are seriously affected by it. The mother is persuaded to join the ranks of the women who demand suffrage and equal rights. In a short time she becomes a full-fledged campaigner and is of great help to the cause. Seeking votes consumes a great part of her time and the child is necessarily neglected. The father reads a notice in the newspaper that a couple, who, having no children of their own, wish to adopt one. This appeals to the mother, who is aware of the fact that her child does not receive sufficient attention, but rather than abandon her work, decides to part with her baby. A large clothes-basket is secured, into which the little fellow is placed, with a note explaining the reason for its presence. The basket is left at the home of the couple who wished to adopt a child. Great was their surprise, upon opening the hamper, and finding a cute youngster and a note, saying that fighting for women's rights gave the mother no time to attend to him. The child is given a good home and is dearly loved by its new parents.

On the anniversary of the child's second birthday, the real mother begins to realize that her child would be more to her than a vote. She persuades her husband to try and get her child back for her. But the present parents refuse to part with him and the mother is heartbroken. She only begins to feel how foolish she had been and now declares that she is through with women suffrage. Day and night she longs to have her boy back and finally the father tells her that he will get the child back at any cost.

The father drives around to the child's home and finds him playing in the garden with a collie dog. Without any delay, he seizes the youngster and jumps into a waiting machine. In the meanwhile the step-mother misses the boy. The dog's queer actions attract her attention and she sends the dog to find the baby. The animal starts out in full pursuit of the auto, but at the time it arrives at the home, where the boy is taken, the child has been placed on a bed to rest. Jumping upon the bed, the dog wakes him and makes him understand, by means of whatever power there exists between children and animals, that he must follow the dog. Obeying his dumb friend, he takes hold of the dog's leash and is lad away from the house. It is not long before the mother discovers that her child is gone and that a dog must have aided in the escape, by the footprints on the bed clothing. Naturally they hasten back to the home of the step-parents, but the child has become tired in the meanwhile, and stopped to rest with its companion. A thorough search fails to recover the child and both the real parents and the step-parents are nearly frantic. While the child is resting, the dog sees a hunter across the field and attracts his attention to the child. The baby tells the huntsman that he does not know where he lives but that the "doggie" does. The hunter lets the animal show the way and the clever animal brings them to where the step-parents are. Great are the rejoicings that follow the return of the lost one. Rather than run the risk of having the child taken away again, the step-parents decide to move to a distant village. Shortly after their departure the real parents arrive, and find the house deserted. They follow in their machine and overtake them on the road. The father offers to hire the step-father as his head gardener and the step-mother for a nurse for the child. All concerned are perfectly willing and the child is restored to its parents with its step-parents constantly around to care for him and grant his every wish.

SHADOWS OF THE MOULIN ROUGE (Four parts).—Dr. Chevrele takes a fancy to his benefactor's wife, unknown to the latter, Mr. Dupont. Dr. Chevrele manifests his admiration for Mrs. Dupont and is repulsed. Later, in revenge, he manages to secure the body of a woman of the streets who has all the facial characteristics of his friend's wife, and substitutes her for Mrs. Dupont, whom he spirits away to a low dive. When Mrs. Dupont awakens from the artificial slumber, she is led to believe that she is a notorious Moulin Rouge habitue. When Mr. Dupont returns from a decoy trip and finds his supposed wife lifeless in her boudoir, he calls for his friend, Dr. Chevrele. The doctor pronounces her dead beyond doubt. While tenderly caressing the lifeless form of his wife, the husband notices several marks on the woman's hand which makes him doubt the real identity of the body. When he violently questions the doctor in regard to this peculiar circumstance, the doctor cunningly motions to those about that the shock has unbalanced the unfortunate man. Immediately the physician spirits Mr. Dupont to an insane asylum, where he is incarcerated in a padded cell. The well-bred Mrs. Dupont, living in the unaccustomed atmosphere of the Parisian underworld, meets with many horrifying experiences and adventures. Her husband escapes from the asylum and is soon able to trace his wife through the designing efforts of the doctor.

Economy, To Be Profitable

Must be practiced in every department of the theatre.

Take lamp house mechanism, for an example. Any exhibitor can save the neat little sum of $25 or more yearly on that one item. Just instruct your operator to use

EZO LAMP LUBRICANT

EZO Lamp Lubricant keeps all movable parts working smoothly and evenly. Adjustments become a positive delight. The carbons can't stick, and are under instant control at all times. It eliminates the wear from heat and friction.

If your exchange doesn't handle EZO Lamp Lubricant, wrap a quarter in one of your letter heads, mail it to us, and we will be pleased to send you a stick.

THE PHANTOSCOPE

We have been saying that the Phantoscope is a good Motion Picture Projector, using the standard film and equipped with standard lenses; that the unbelievable results obtained came about by reason of the new principles involved in its construction and that an intelligent use of the Phantoscope would produce results to your entire satisfaction. WE NOW HAVE PROOF OF IT. Since these ADS began five weeks ago, we have sold an average of TWO PHANTOSCOPES DAILY. The sales began with single machines, then as familiarity with the machine and resultant satisfaction in the projection became general, the sales have increased until our last two sales have been for A DOZEN PHANTOSCOPES EACH. Our customers are the Government Departments, Industrial Concerns, Railroads, Colleges, Exchanges, Camera Men and Private Individuals. The Buyers are intelligent men with no prejudice to overcome but insistent upon satisfactory results. That is why we are getting repeated orders.

Here's a simple solution of the problem. The Eclectic features fulfill all the requirements needed to meet the popular demand. It is therefore profitable for you to book them—all of them. You're not taking any chances, and you will have no cause for regret.

One of the best releases we ever made is entitled:

A Man's Shadow

In Six Parts (Copyrighted) Ready January 20th

A remarkable detective story, powerful and gripping in its intensity. It is an adaptation from a famous novel by the eminent French author,

JULES MARY

The story will hold the attention from the first to the last foot, and will positively convince you that seldom, if ever, has a film of equal merit been brought to your attention. The scenes depicting the murder of the money-lender, the subsequent court trial, and the escape of the convict from Devil's Island are bound to evoke the most enthusiastic expressions of satisfaction. It is truly a feature of features.

Is it any wonder exhibitors are writing enthusiastic letters? Any wonder users of General Film Service are coining money? Here are four such letters from the top of a heap big enough to fill a book:—

Dear Sirs:-

Received your letter Dec 18th and in regard to same will say that the reason I quit using your service was because I was led to believe that I could get better service elsewhere for the same money so I tryed an Independent firm to my sorrow as the stuff is greatly inferior to your goods for the same money. Will again take up your service in the near future.

Being a new man in the business am liable to make mistakes and I consider this one of the many that I have already made as my patronage has dropped off greatly in the last week.

Respectively,

Gentlemen:-

Some days ago I received a shipment of films from your company,in the shipment were two reels of the Essany,as these films seemed to be a fair sample of this company, I decided to test these with two reels of 101 Bison, belonging to a different exchange. After the show I asked all who had seen the show to vote ,or decide which make of film they thought was best, and resulted in favor of Essany,43-17. After this decisive showing in favor of licensed films, I have again decided to take up your service ,and as long as this standard is kept up to stay with you.

Dear Friend Preller:-

Please find attached our check, bill attached for film rental.

It is fast becoming one of the pleasures of my life to write this check for film service, which, without exception is positively the BEST IN THE WORLD, of course, this may sound like a one man version, and strange enough it is, but why, simply because we tried the others before we did the General Service and we know what our receipts we BEFORE and AFTER we used the General Service.

Every week we are approached by Feature Representatives and our only reply to them is: kindly sit thro our regular release feature supplied by the General Film Company and if you have anything better to offer, we will be pleased to listen to you, those who act on this suggestion seldom offer their features as it is evident there is no better features to be obtained.

We attribute the success of the Blue Mouse to your service.

Wishing you and your courteous assistants all of the good things for the New Year, we remain,

YOUR ATTENTION

As this review is not of a character calculated to popularize a motion picture, we desire to make a public announcement by this page advertisement calling attention to the fact that the Photo Drama Motion Picture Company which is said to control "The House of Bondage" is in no way to be associated with THE PHOTO DRAMA COMPANY, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Illinois in this country with a branch in Paris which controls and has controlled the beautiful AMBROSIO version of "THE LAST DAYS OF POMPEII," which spectacle was exploited with such great success throughout the United States and Canada by George Kleine.

For Release Tuesday, February 3rd

A distinctly unique and novel version of Rossini's Opera—staged in and about Seville, Spain, and featuring those "Leads" whose work in the Ambrosio Masterpiece, "The Last Days of Pompeii," assisted so materially in the world fame of that mighty production.

Photographically one of the most beautiful pictures we have ever seen, carrying the thread of a world-old love story through settings of great natural beauty.

There's a piquancy and charm to the story of Figaro's Marriage, so daintily ludicrous, yet so fascinatingly told as to be quite without comparison in the annals of Grand Opera —A thoroughly refined and highly entertaining subject.

Especially for this release we have imported some rarely beautiful lithographed 8-sheets in addition to a splendid line of 1, 3 and 6-sheets. Music adapted from the famous Opera will be supplied gratis through the General Film Company.

Facts and Comments

THERE is no mistaking the sentiment of the reputable film producers touching the threatened inundation of films purporting to picture the so-called secrets of the white slave trade. The producers have almost unanimously gone on record as violently opposed to this degradation, or attempted degradation, of the motion picture. The public conscience has revolted against these exhibitions. The police are on the alert and, fortified with the decisions of the courts, they will be able to prevent any attempted public exhibition of the offensive films. The authors of the most reprehensible of these productions, we are glad to observe, have had no previous connection with the making of pictures and the motion picture art can in no way be blamed for their action. Of course, some part of the public will be unable to discriminate, but the larger part, we hope, realize that these "enterprises" are undertaken by strangers to the industry, men to whom the motion picture appeals as a quick way of making money and who care nothing whatever about the reputation of the motion picture. Their investment is of the most picayune sort. They are gambling—"taking a chance," as it is called. They have it in their power to harm the picture, but they will harm themselves and their pocketbooks much more than the motion picture.

A FRIEND of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD in Kansas writes that "Facts and Comments" inspired him to invoke Apollo and the Muses and finally mount the immortal Pegasus with this result:

From week to week, in the M. P. World,
I read of imprecations at the pictures hurled.
Some from the pulpit and some from the press,
Some from people who like to knock, I guess.
How do you know in what way to mend
The pictures today, if you never attend.
Brother! you're narrow and in your own way,
For the pictures are here and here to stay.
If you've never seen one, how do you know
So much vice attends the picture show?
See "Star of Bethlehem" or "From Manger to Cross,"
Or any Bible story, and you'll be at a loss,
To know why you were so narrow and small,
As to rant and rave at the pictures at all.
There are people in pictures, players I mean,
Who are Christians and held in high esteem
By those who know them for what they are.
They are better than you, "Brother," better by far.

While no classic values are claimed for these rhymes, they drive the point home and we hope that our clerical friends will give them due consideration.

FROM present indications it seems altogether probable that the reviewer of features and pictures in general will soon be replaced by the reviewer of posters. We will soon read something like this: "The one sheet of this feature is remarkable for its color scheme, while the three sheet abounds in startling action. The drops of blood on the six sheets were most realistic. It is suggested that the bottom of the mounted six sheet be saturated with red ink and that the crimson fluid be permitted to flow dropwise into a bucket under the banner." The slogan seems to be: "I care not how abominable your picture is if I can only make the paper for it."

* * *

BY AFFIRMING a judgment of punitive damages against the Vitagraph Company for publishing the picture of a man without his consent, the Court of Appeals in this state has classed the motion picture with the newspapers, regarding both as "publications." If the motion picture is held responsible just as the newspaper is then the motion picture ought to enjoy the same privileges that are accorded to the newspaper and among these is absolute freedom from the previous restraint of censorship.

ACCORDING to a news item in the daily press, a spectator at a moving picture entertainment died of heart failure resulting from a laughing fit superinduced by a funny picture. Let us not be too rash in drawing conclusions from these facts. Possibly the man was suffering from an overdeveloped sense of humor and apt to see the funny angles in a funeral, or the bright spots in a railway disaster. Perhaps he was fortunate, or in his case, unfortunate enough to see a really funny picture which has escaped the notice of the critics. With few exceptions, the flow of filmed humor seems to be running pretty low just now in the opinion of a good many exhibitors.

Prigs is Prigs

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

TO issue diatribes against censorship of all kinds is almost as easy as it is to be a censor, and one may be as unreasonable as the other. To be merely censorious, whether of moving pictures or of censorship, requires only a fault-finding habit and inability to grasp the dignity and largeness of this new art which will eventually lift it to higher realms than it has yet attained. Moving pictures as now released may constitute a jungle to be cleared, but it must be kept in mind that to impose slavery on creative talent may easily convert that jungle into a barren waste.

There is a middle course of horse sense or, more truly, of good common sense, which is broad enough for all to follow. On one side is the oozing slime some unscrupulous producers would use to splash the screen with the filth of social evils, calculated to whet the curiosity of immature minds. On the other is that desolate mediocrity of puritanism which has brought the world no new element of pleasure, suggested no new departure of thought, passion or beauty, that stands in no relation to this progressive age.

From pruriency on one side and pragmatism on the other, Good Lord, deliver us!

I do not see that we are to break the shackles of monotony and escape from the clutches of the commonplace by either wallowing in the mire on one side or by wandering amid the charmless desert of puritanism on the other. Drama is deeply concerned with our inherent depravity, and live screen stories may, we beseech Thee to hear us, transform our sins into factors of enlightenment. Teach us what to do, Oh wondrous New Art, even tell us how to do it, but please make it as attractive as possible!

In regard to licensing theaters in England, Henry Arthur Jones has much of interest to say. He agrees that, "inasmuch as cheap places of amusement are those where large crowds assemble, managers may be held responsible for anything shown which is indecent, or dangerous, or harmful to the general body of their frequenters." He continues, "I say that there is no doubt that a license, a set of regulations, is necessary. We are all agreed upon that. But surely this license ought to be framed with the idea, and in the intention of not stopping any amusement that is not dangerous or harmful or indecent."

Of censorship he says, "English playgoers and amusement seekers do not need a censor to protect them from their dramatists—they are competent to judge us and, when it is necessary, to condemn us." Again, speaking of great playwrights, "The true artist is the only man who accurately knows the spiritual value of his work, and the greater, the more trustworthy his judgment; witness many who have been almost solitary judges, the rightness of whose judgment has eventually been confirmed in the only way possible, by the verdict and the acclamation of the public."

Mr. Jones protests against censoring the work of men of genius or those whose intellectual training has broadened their views and sympathies. Such men are rare, so rare that they are to be cherished for their helpful ideals and excused for views that seem in advance of the times. Let us leave them uncensored and turn to men running the picture shows, some of whom are well qualified to decide what should be shown to the people, while others might well be classed among the mentally unemployed. Are all, good, bad and indifferent, to be licensed and their places closed if they exhibit what is "dangerous, harmful or indecent?"

In the pursuit of information, I should like to know if licensing theaters and holding the managers responsible for what is exhibited would be an improvement on the present system of censoring pictures before they are released. Would not such a course offer opportunities for graft? Has the average Mayor any particular qualification for censorship? Might not the Mayor of one town permit pictures to be shown, whose exhibition in a neighboring town would cause theater managers to be fined or put out of business?

It seems to me that reasonable discussion of this subject from all points of view is better than precise and priggish assertion. If there is a vexatious dilemma involved, with earnest and determined men divided in opinion, the question should be treated in a loftier and more searching way than by arbitrary assertion. It might be handled in a spirit free from individual bitterness. It would not be a bad plan for exhibitors and producers to appoint small and intelligent committees capable of solving the problem, whether that be of censorship or its abolition.

Henry Arthur Jones, in addressing a committee to examine the working of censorship in England, makes a nice distinction. "If the censor is to be continued, let him stop indecency, but let him not meddle with morality and immorality. There is a radical difference between indecency and immorality." It does seem hard to ask so much of those holding the unenviable and thankless positions of censors, that they should be burdened with deciding what is and what is not moral. Ethical codes are as inconstant as the moon. Good Bishops and Kaisers have proscribed the Tango and yet hotel dancing New Year's Eve reduced the sale of liquors sixty per cent.

Henry Arthur Jones is on sure ground when he asserts that prigs have naught to do with men of creative genius nor with men whose bright critical faculty moulds the art it finds ready to hand. Mediocrity may only weigh mediocrity; stupidity may only applaud incompetence; the prig, both mediocre and stupid, is unaware that what startles and confuses him is usually one of those steps forward which saved us from monotony of existence if not, indeed, from monotony of type. Not ideal virtue, but human sin and shame, is at the bottom of our eternal struggle, the foundation of drama.

I do not pretend to sit in judgment on the present Board of Censors, but it must be obvious to rational minds that even the mildest censorship is bound to create disappointment and individual ill feeling now and then—to point out occasional injustice is to beg the larger issue. If the National Board is dissolved, will not exhibitors and producers suffer greater injustice, amounting in some cases to oppression, at the hands of stupid legislatures and incompetent instruments of the law? Besides the rejection of what is indecent and plainly harmful, will not the question of what is moral or immoral be raised in various sections of the country?

Freedom does not mean chaotic license. Would not producers prefer to operate under mild restraint and be sure of the status of a release before advertising and printing a lot of positives? Would not exhibitors feel a greater sense of security under present arrangements than if their abolition resulted in unfavorable legislation and its enforcement? Almost the worst of all things that could be done would be to draw down upon the head of this young art a lot of political ignorance and envy.

From Prigs, Politicians and Pragmatists, Good Lord, we pray Thee, deliver us.

No Lowering of Standards

By W. Stephen Bush

THE production of motion pictures has in the course of time reached certain standards of art and of ethics. These standards represent the efforts of many years. The growth of these standards has been slow and laborious. The progress has been general, but in one particular field it has been especially striking. In the treatment of standard popular fiction and of the classics the great producers of the world have set up a high mark which, like a light upon a hill, is or ought to be a precious guide to all who would come into the field.

The present rush into the producing field of men of insufficient talent and training threatens to obliterate this high mark. If the efforts of a horde of cheap directors are not checked we will be inundated with a veritable flood of cheap productions, discrediting the name of the motion picture and making it once more an object of contempt to the intelligent and fairly educated portion of our public.

We all remember how four and five years ago an attempt to film any famous creation of literature was received with contemptuous mirth. The pioneers in the uplift and redemption of the motion picture had a path of thorns before them. Their own colleagues in the producing branch ridiculed the idea of raising the motion picture to something higher than a cheap amusement of the dime museum order. Despite all sneers and scoffs the motion picture progressed and today it occupies the position of a recognized modern art.

The future of the motion picture depends upon its adherence to the standards now established and upon constant and earnest efforts for further improvement. Any attempt to lower such standards and to go back to the gloomful days of "Yankee" films and "Comet" films and "Columbia" films, etc., etc., etc., must be vigorously resisted by every friend of the picture. We want to go forward and not backward.

The avalanche of cheap features made here and abroad threatens to drive the most desirable patrons out of the motion picture theater. The end of the "freak" feature seems in sight, though it is still popular. Let us remember how extremely popular "chases" were in the very early stages of the industry. I have seen exhibitors and operators fight for them at the exchanges. Their day even then was shortlived. Now the out-and-out chase has been abandoned by the producers and has become a rarity on the screen. The "Western," too, was thought to be the foundation and the hope of the motion picture. It came to its destined end where the "freak" feature will shortly follow it.

In the meantime we would like to speak a word of kindly warning to the growing number of citizens who are under the impression that the production of motion pictures is a short cut to everlasting prosperity. Time and again we have seen the birth, the fitful life and the untimely death of enterprises founded upon the simple faith that there were quick millions in the business of producing motion pictures. A man or a woman has a few thousand dollars in the savings bank, where it draws a low but safe and cheerful interest. He or she knows somebody who knows a man who will convert the thousands into millions by starting to make pictures. One of these "angel-snatchers" used to boast in the olden days that he could make a reel of a thousand feet for fifty dollars. He would hire a motley company of performers, embark with them in a ferry boat to Weehawken, write the scenario on his cuffs while en route and return with a kinematographic reflection of his own "nerve." The game now is to go into making "features."

It is impossible to close one's eyes to the humor of the situation, especially when one has been privileged to look at some of the features which have in this wise been precipitated upon the long-suffering screen. Oldtime exhibitors are reminded of the days when anything suitable to be run through a projection machine was considered a success quite irrespective of what happened to be on the celluloid. In a recent "feature" a typical melodramatic heroine is bound, gagged, and put into a barrel to be cast into the water and hurled over a celebrated waterfalls. The young lady, thoroughly in earnest, struggles against the three miserable "villains" and forgetting the director's instruction, actually works off the bandage about her mouth. The moment it comes off she realizes her mistake and is evidently very much embarrassed about what she is to do next. The camera man notices her distress just a second too late and the shipwreck of the thrilling scene has found its way onto the film. With raw stock cheaper than ever before, and with the artists hired by the day the scene might have been retaken, but such trifles do not bother the enthusiasts who are now rushing into the production of features by battalions. While there is no trace whatever of any dramatic action or any coherent plot, there is plenty of rushing around by heroes and some powerful plain and fancy foiling by villains. In one scene the hero is caught by the villain and trussed up to prepare him for some awful fate and in the next scene the hero works off the fetters and, finding the villain, ties him up for delivery to the police. As both hero and villain are very careless in the technique of their tying up work it follows that they are forever escaping and pursuing. By the simple process of chasing, gaps of say two or three hundred feet in the development of what story there is are easily filled in and the patient public must endure this sort of thing ad nauseam.

While the humorous side of the situation is surely amusing to the critics and all sensible persons, the serious aspect of these conditions cannot be lost sight of. In the first place the cheap feature tends to affect the general quality of the pictures. A year and less than a year ago it was easy to palm off such features on the public; today it is much more difficult. As the investment of these new fangled feature makers is of the shoestring variety, they make a profit even with the poorest stuff, and other producers with more conscience are sorely tempted to lower their standards. In the second place it is clear that a constant influx of poor and cheaply made features is bound to hurt the popularity of the picture.

We believe that the avenues to the producing field should at all times be kept wide open. Where we see good intentions joined to ambition and ability the mistakes which must come with all first attempts ought to be dealt with in the kindest of spirits and every evidence of progress ought be recorded and encouraged in every possible way. Where, however, there are manifest incompetency and low standards either in art or in ethics, the best treatment is the radical treatment. The process of dissipating the hoards and accumulating the experience of "angels" will go on to the end of time, but it should not be permitted to clog the progress of the art of producing motion pictures.

Charles Pathe's Views

The Great Pioneer Speaks Freely and Entertainingly on Film Situation Here and Abroad—No Longer Actively Engaged in Producing—Calls America the Best Market and Expects Bigger Things Than Ever Before—On His Way Back to France After Brief Visit Here.

By W. Stephen Bush.

MR. CHARLES PATHE, of the great firm whose name is heard around the world, has left this country to return to France. He was here for about three weeks and to use his own phraseology, "every minute of that time was measured most carefully." He came here to look over the American field of kinematography and account to his own satisfaction for the changes that had recently come over the market affecting the Pathe productions as well as all the output of all other American producers and importers.

Mr. Pathe was found in the cozy private office of the great plant and studio in Jersey City, where he seemed as much enthroned in the allegiance of his staff as when I saw him last in the luxurious offices of the famous establishment at Vincennes, near Paris. Mr. Pathe is a type of the well-bred courteous Frenchman and possessed of a most engaging personality. His speech is slow, deliberate, distinct and always modest, his manners are pleasant and refined. No one realized better than M. Pathe the cultural mission of the motion picture and none realized the responsibilities of the producer sooner than he did. In the educational field the Pathes are to-day facile princeps, easily the first as witness their splendid educational department at Vincennes.

Mr. Charles Pathe.

To hear the head of an enterprise so vast and so successful must be instructive at all times, and in the present condition of affairs on our side of the water his words were all the more enlightening. Like all really big men, M. Charles Pathe is most approachable. While he and his firm have long ago achieved a world-wide fame to which but little can be added, he is ready at all times to give his views on the motion picture, its past, its present and its future.

No one appreciates more than M. Pathe the importance of a free and untrammeled journalism specially devoted to the interest and advancement of motion pictures. He does not hesitate to speak for publication when the time demands it, and he speaks with refreshing plainness and simplicity. Knowing that the readers of The Moving Picture World have a legitimate interest in his views and his ideas and his observations, he answered every question with the greatest readiness and often went fully into topics which he felt were much considered and discussed in the inner and outer circles of the industry.

With true French clearness and precision of speech, Mr. Pathe said at the outset of the interview that he was no longer producing on his own account. To quote him literally:

"As far as I am concerned I have almost completely ceased producing on my own account. In my studios in France, Germany, Holland, Italy, Sweden, Russia, and elsewhere, I have selected those assistants and directors who have shown special talent and set them to producing on their own account. Under specified conditions I market their productions for them just as a publisher handles the books of his authors on a royalty basis. In the moving picture business this royalty is a percentage on each foot of positive film sold."

The results of this system, as Mr. Pathe presently proceeded to explain, have been highly satisfactory.

"Some of my directors," continued M. Pathe, "have obtained extraordinary results. I will mention Max Linder, who is rather well known in America and very popular in Europe. This conscientious and hardworking artist, under the old system, earned some five to six thousand dollars a year. To-day working on his own account under the conditions which now prevail, and which I have just explained to you, he clears some forty to sixty thousand dollars a year, though he produces only one-third as much as he produced before. Sixty thousand dollars may not strike an American as a very great amount, but in Europe it represents a huge salary which no dramatic author ever draws regularly year after year. Several of our directors do the same as Max Linder, each producing about four features a year, each feature containing from four to eight well-written and well-produced reels.

"Under these conditions a director can earn as much and even more than any celebrated dramatic author and acquire as great a reputation in a shorter lapse of time. What an opportunity for the younger generation of men engaged in literary and dramatic pursuits. What a chance for them to secure a profitable standing in the theater of the future: The Kinematograph. There is no doubt that popularitv and fortune will smile upon them there quicker than in any other literary field, where they may be forced to waste many precious years in the crowded anterooms of publishers. If their ambition is well directed they will understand that the only danger in their path is the danger which has been the stumbling block of most of the producers of the day—overproduction. Two or three big features a year, or in the case of an exceptionally clever director four or five should be their limit. Such productions will insure not only good immediate compensation, but in a very few years will bring them fortune and fame.

"I have no doubt that we will soon see the brilliant minds of the new generation who seem to be natnrally drawn to the theater join the ranks of the film men who are opening the doors to unrestricted hopes. Success such as Mark Twain attained can only be reached in literature after long years of struggle, in the field of kinematography will be a daily occurrence. The exponents of its art have fame and fortune within their grasp and it will be a fame transcending even that of your great humorist. If the works of the latter have been translated into many languages, the works of the former will be famed all over the world without distinction of race or language."

Mr. Pathe was asked what he thought of the present conditions of the market.

"The moving picture industry," he answered, "is now undergoing a considerable evolution. There was a time, not very far remote, when the film production of Europe and especially that of France dominated the markets of the world. A very rapid decentralization is now taking place, however, as was the case in the theatrical business, only in our case the decentralization is even more marked. Each and every country is striving to produce at home subjects which are better adapted to the special mentality and taste of their motion picture patrons. For this reason European manufacturers attain only a relative success with the film they ship to America, and for the same reason the American production, which for the last few years has been in high favor in Europe, is now losing considerable ground in that market.

"There is an enormous overproduction of film, most of it being trite and commonplace. This triteness will certainly disgust the spectator in a very short time and in order to step out of this dangerous rut certain producers have started that which is known as the "feature film," in other words stories having big subjects and sensational effects. But sensational effects are limited and so producers are featuring books and plays by celebrated authors. Very fine adaptations have already been made; adaptations which justify large publicity on the part of the exhibitor, that the attention of the public may be further drawn to these features—the kind of picture which is at present obviously favored by the public. I believe that in the future all the attention and efforts of editors will be directed toward this goal. The enormous financial returns obtained by some widely known films may not be repeated, but this new method will certainly have the beneficial result of elevating the general standard of production and react to the greatest benefit of all concerned."

"I do not say that I am not satisfied with the present conditions and the present returns, but I see opportunities for profitable changes and the changes will be made. In proportion to the great business we have established, we think we can do much very much better. I believe the situation will improve all along the line and in every branch of the industry. I firmly believe that everybody will be benefited under the coming order of things. I have studied conditions here with some care and I anticipate great things for the future.

"Europe," Mr. Pathe went on, "has adjusted itself to the new conditions and America will follow. There is no question that America is the best market in the world, but it has not been handled to the best advantage and I hope that by an adjustment to the change in the conditions better results will be obtained than ever before."

"Is it true," I asked, "that you will hereafter discontinue the production of single reels entirely?"

"Yes," Mr. Pathe replied, "that is practically correct. All our efforts hereafter will be directed toward the making of features. Time was when the multiple reel feature counted as the exception and the single reel constituted the rule—this order will now be reversed."

I requested Mr. Pathe's opinion of the exhibiting branch of the industry in this country. He said he had not seen much of American motion picture theaters outside of New York, but he believed that, on the whole, the presentation of motion pictures was done more successfully on the other side than here.

"Do not misunderstand me," he was quick to add, "you have most excellent theaters here, but you change almost everywhere every day, while in Europe the daily change is very rare indeed. That is the reason or one of the reasons why the average presentation is better in Europe. Yes, I mean projection and, of course, music. Especially is this true, I think, of the smaller houses. The smaller houses in France and in other parts of Europe have more time to bestow care and take more pains with their presentation than you have here with your daily changes. The country theater averages better abroad than here as far as presentation is concerned."

If Mr. Pathe is now no longer active personally in the producing end, and if he delights in the part of a publisher of good pictures, it must be added that he is a most sympathetic publisher, one whose greatest delight is a good picture. He has a keen eye for budding talent and possesses all the love of art and the generosity which Horace credited to Maecenas. In the very prime of life, reaping the rewards of long years of earnest and conscientious work, M. Pathe is a gigantic force for good on both sides of the Atlantic. Bon Voyage.

The Mark-Brock Consolidation.

There has recently been perfected in the Eastern Canadian district a consolidation of large theater interests into a grand circuit which will be known as United Motion Picture Theaters, Limited. This new combination began doing business on January 5.

Mitchel H. Mark, of Buffalo, is president of the company. Mr. Mark has been closely identified with moving pictures for more than fifteen years and, according to the announcement of the company, "has organized more successful moving picture enterprises than any other one man on this continent." According to Henry J. Brock, of Buffalo, managing director, "the company is ready to consider any moving picture exhibiting proposition, no matter how large." Besides Messrs. Mark and Brock, are the following directors of the corporation: Edward Cronyn, Toronto, vice-president; Sir Henry M. Pellatt, Toronto; Eugene L. Falk, Buffalo, secretary; S. Ginsburg, Buffalo, treasurer; Norman MacDonald, Buffalo, and Harry Brouse, Ottawa. The company has consolidated these interests: New Academy Theater Co., operating the Academy Theater in Buffalo; Mark-Brock Enterprises, Limited, operating the Family Theater, Ottawa; The People's Amusement Co., Limited, operating the Francais Theater, Ottawa, and the Metropolitan Theaters, Limited, operating the Strand Theater, Toronto.

These companies were organized and managed by the Mark-Brock Theatrical Enterprises of Buffalo. In connection with this last named concern, this offical announcement has just been made: "The business of this firm has grown so rapidly of late and so many favorable opportunities for successful modern picture houses in the United States and Canada are arising with the tremendous growth in the popularity of moving pictures, that it was decided to consolidate the above mentioned interests under the management of Henry J. Brock who has been associated for years with Mr. Mark. The purpose is to form the nucleus of a strong and growing chain of picture houses under one head. The outcome of this plan has been the incorporation of the United Motion Picture Theaters, Limited." In connection with the new company, President Mark said, in part: "The time was never more favorable for the formation of a large circuit of strictly high class picture houses than the present. Our attention at the present time has been directed to a number of most desirable locations for new houses, and our intention is to proceed immediately to make the necessary arrangements for theaters at these points."

A CORNER IN THE KALEM STUDIO AT JACKSONVILLE, FLORIDA.

Few companies are fortunate enough to work amid such splendid surroundings as the members of the Kalem forces who are spending the winter at the Kalem Studios, at Jacksonville.

The above picture shows a corner of the studio. The less fortunate northerners who sigh for heavier overcoats to ward off the winter's chill, will gaze with envy upon the people in the picture who evidently find the sun's rays a trifle too warm for coats.

The photograph was taken at the time when "Her Husband's Friend," a two-part Kalem feature was being produced. The performers at the table will be recognized as Alice Hollister and Harry Maillarde. The energetic figure standing half-way up the step-ladder is none other than "Bob" Vignola, the Kalem director who produced the photoplay.

"A Romance of the Sea"

Two-Reel Broncho.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

ROMANCE in dramatic form is so popular that the only astonishing thing about it is that it has not been overdone. Whether or not it follows the lines of least resistance, there is tucked back in our bosoms an inextinguishable liking for high-colored content of stirring action. No matter if Action is far in the lead, and Characterization almost out of the running, there is enough of a demand in the average mixed audience for an occasional romance to keep such photodramas steadily on the program.

I saw two plays at this session, one of superior artistic beauty, but chose the piratical "Romance of the Sea," its subject matter as old as the dime novel that used to strain our eyes when we should have been in bed, because it is well done and closer to the sympathies of a very large element in the motion picture audience. Unlike most pirate stories told on the screen, all of the action takes place where there is a seascape or on board of an actual ship sailing the high seas, and the characters are not decked out in nice clean clothes fresh from the wardrobe room.

Enter Captain Rood, strapping young hero, and to the rescue of an old salt, who is set upon by the hirelings of a "former mate of a piratical craft," one Roderick Due. All this occurs at Portsmouth in the days of old. Captain Rood lays the ruffians low and carries the old salt to his home and the tender mercies of "Ethel," our hero's sweetheart wife. The old salt is badly used up, but he lives long enough to give Captain Rood evidence of gratitude in the shape of a chart which locates a treasure chest. Villainous Roderick peeps in at the window and sees all. He smiles with blood-curdling significance, and we know that there is trouble ahead for those we like best.

Captain Rood finds it easy to get sailors to man his ship when he sets sail on a voyage of adventure and discovery. Why? With the exception of the cook and the boatswain, the entire crew is made up of Roderick Due's hirelings, and the "former mate of a piratical craft" insinuates his services as mate upon the unsuspecting hero. The captain takes along his pretty wife to bear him company, but, from the outset, the predatory instincts of the piratical mate are active; in fact, the pretty wife tells her husband "He always looks at me with an air of possession."

It is all too true. Roderick claims her as part of his share of the booty when all is ready for mutiny, but the boatswain has caught the habit of listening and overhears the plot just as the treasure island is sighted. He assists Captain Rood and his wife to escape in the long boat, after some thrilling scenes aboard ship, and they reach the island in advance of the mutineers. The latter are attacked by Indians and nearly all killed—it is an unimportant detail how the ship is to be handled without them.

The Indians now decide to use the crew's boat to board the ship, but the loyal cook is there. He fires the solitary ship's cannon with such deadly accuracy that he hits the savages about a half mile away and blows them to kingdom come. The hero and heroine, assisted by the loyal boatswain, find the treasure chest, manage to get it aboard, now that the coast is clear, and the villain, Roderick Due, gets what is coming to such as him. He dies like a dog, as the good ship disappears on her way home.

British Notes

(Special Correspondence to THE WORLD.)

A CURIOUS anachronism has been discovered by some observant visitor to London's kinemas, many of which are at the moment exhibiting moving pictures of grand opera scenes and singers. With these synchronizing adaptations, and real singers placed behind the screen, realistic vocal effects are secured. But the singers on the screen and those behind often sing in different tongues. For instance, a film intended as a visual accompaniment to the "Miserere" from "Il Trovatore," and produced in Italy, was sung to in English at a West End theater. This is, of course, not noticeable by everyone and had it been exhibited at an East End theater, may have passed unnoticed.

The annual meeting of the Incorporated Association of Film Renters was held in London last week. Mr. J. Williamson was re-elected chairman and Mr. J. W. Smith treasurer. The annual report stated that the membership of the association is now 83, while another clause stated that, in order to protect the interests of renters who are interested in expensive exclusives, especially those adapted from works in which there is no copyright, it may be advisable to see what steps can be taken to prevent inferior films being palmed off in unfair competition with extensively advertised films which have been produced at great expense.

A firm of photographic chemists (The Vanguard Co., of Maidenhead), have marketed a non-inflammable medium for coating glass as a means of writing notices, in pen or pencil, for projection upon the screen. It has been prepared specially for the use of moving picture operators and dries rapidly.

Alex. G. Donnelly, of 55 John St., New York City, is seeking to patent in this country an invention for photographing and projecting pictures by means of photographic plates. In the specification deposited at the Patent Office, over twenty detailed drawings are given and these should be consulted to from an adequate idea of the invention.

Another invention for which there seems to be a greater future is for the film mechanism of projectors upon a new principle. An imperforated film is drawn past the lens by a roller instead of the orthodox clutch. This roller operates intermittently so that each exposure of the film appears in the lens aperture in proper order. The principle claim for the idea is the reduction of wear and tear of films.

SCHEENBAUM LEAVES PATHE.

M. H. Scheenbaum, the technical expert and guide connected with the great Pathe studio at Vincennes, has severed his connection with Pathe Freres and is now located in New York City. Mr. Scheenbaum leaves his old position on the best of terms with his old employers. Few men are more thoroughly at home in the world of moving picture patents than Mr. Scheenbaum, who has been consulted by experts in patents pertaining to motion pictures both here and abroad. Mr. Scheenbaum intends to stay in this country and his great knowledge and experience will soon enable him to find a position where he can make his ability count for much. He is fairly familiar with conditions in this country having often visited the United States on general business and on patent matters. He speaks English with the ease and fluency of a native and commands a complete knowledge of French and German as well.

"The Grip of Circumstances," (Essanay.)

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

A "RAFFLES" story of unusual interest has been filmed by Essanay under the title, "The Grip of Circumstance." E. H. Calvert, who has won well-merited praise for his characterizations of prominent roles in former Essanay subjects, has produced this two-reel subject very creditably. The production shows careful attention to detail, as well as the atmosphere of caste, the latter being highly essential in this filmed story. There are several attractive interiors in which painstaking care and good taste are shown as happily. Rogers, the butler, appears almost as large, to the critical eye, as Malden, in the talented keeping of Thomas Commerford. This is, indeed, a finely drawn character. Miss Ruth Stonehouse is exceedingly attractive in the role of Frances Edwards, and Miss Angela Dolores assumes the role of the society matron, Mrs. Edwards, with both polish and dignity. James Darwin, the rival of "Raffles" for the hand of Frances, is capably presented by Richard C. Travers. Mr. Calvert, the producer, appears in the short part of the detective with his customary art.

The photography of these two reels will appeal to everyone.

Jay Malden, a polished society man, is a "Raffles" in disguise. He gains social entrance to the Edwards' home, where both the mother and her daughter, Frances, welcome his visits with unconcealed pleasure. James Darwin, her old lover, is discarded for the time, much to the regret of Rogers, the honest old butler of the Edwards' household.

Pieces of valuable plateware disappear in a most mysterious manner. Malden, to whom Mrs. and Miss Edwards make known their loss, centers suspicion on the faithful Rogers. Soon afterwards a costly ring worn by Mrs. Edwards is lost. Malden, who had stolen it and the plates, contrives to throw the whole blame on Rogers by finding the ring in the vest pocket of the latter. Poor Rogers is dismissed, and he is on the verge of starvation when James Darwin secures a position for him in the coatroom of Darwin's club.

Malden is also a member of this club. One evening Darwin places his jeweled cigarette case on the club table, and forgets it as he goes out to make a call. Malden secrets it, and soon afterwards goes to the coatroom and places it in the pocket of his overcoat, fearing the danger of carrying it on his person. Rogers observes this from a concealed position.

Darwin misses the case and returns to the club. He fails to find it, and tells of his loss to the club manager, in the presence of Rogers. The latter makes known the action of Malden. Darwin asks permission to search Malden's overcoat, and the case is found, and also pawntickets for the Edwards' plates. The club detective is called, and the case is again placed in the pocket of Malden's overcoat. That worthy soon appears at the pawnbroker's shop to dispose of the case. He is arrested; Rogers is restored to his old position, and James Darwin to the love of Frances Edwards.

The release date is February 6th.

PATHE'S WEEKLY GETS NEWSPAPER SERVICE.

Pathe's Weekly is now on a basis never before attempted in the motion picture news business. A number of changes have recently been made tending to put it on a real newspaper footing, among them the securing of an associated press man for the position of editor, and the installation of a private telegraph wire, but now it is announced that the most important step of all has been taken and that contracts have been closed with the United Press for their complete news service. Such an arrangement is unique in moving picture annals and no other manufacturer will be able to secure this service, as it is exclusive with Pathe. The contracts have been made upon a coöperative basis whereby Pathe's Weekly camera men may also serve the United Press as occasions require. This will insure, to a large degree, motion pictures of important events as they are happening and which means much additional interest. With the large force of "Weekly" camera men scattered over the United States and several who will soon be sent to Canada, practically every event of interest can be covered by the aid of the United Press Service. The Weekly now boasts of camera men in every civilized country of the world.

ARTHUR JOHNSON MAKES A SPEECH.

Arthur Johnson recently accepted the invitation of the Eclectic Club in a Philadelphia suberb to deliver an informal talk on The Mission of the Motion Picture. When li'l Artha arrived at the club he found himself the guest of 300 staid housewives. As each speaker addressed the audience Johnson's courage oozed, for all the speeches were rabid attacks against the photoplay. With "evil," "harmful," "pernicious" and "immoral" assailing his ears, Johnson realized that his "informal chat" would seem very spineless indeed. When called upon to talk, the Lubin star determined to seize his opportunity. He made a spirited defense, calling into play his remarkable powers of oratory, and ended by inviting the entire club to visit the Lubin studio the following afternoon. The staid housewives, now that they have seen for themselves, have changed their adjectives.

GEORGE KLEINE NOTIFICATION TO EXHIBITORS.

"The Duke's Talisman."

The Gaumont Company to Release a Five-Part Subject of Unusual Strength Beautifully Photographed.

By George Blaisdell.

SOMEBODY has said that a play is as strong as its strongest moment. If we may for the present occasion accept this statement as literally true—and unquestionably there are conceivable circumstances in which it would be false—"The Duke's Talisman" is a rare picture. For of strong moments not only is there one; there are a half dozen situations any one of which is of sufficient dramatic strength to constitute a climax for a good production. In the first place, there is a powerful story—one that imposes much responsibility on the shoulders of a director. There are many opportunities for the exercise of fine judgment as to what constitutes the line between melodrama and the portrayal of life. It is a producer's picture; and the man who stood beside the camera was aided by most competent artists. The story, which is told in a prologue and four parts, arouses the interest in the first scene and holds it with increasing tensity right to the last. The observer is kept in doubt almost to the end. He is hoping against hope that the denouement will be a happy one, but owing to the complicating interference of the libertinous captain of the duke's police, there is present the fear that the threat to make of the mock execution a real one will be carried out.

The main theme of the action concerns the love of the Countess Maddalena for Danielo Langeli, a fugitive for the capture of whom the Duke of Albano has offered a heavy reward. Langeli is in love with Ginetta, maid to the countess. The countess conceals Langeli in her house. When pressed hard by the police, the fugitive escapes and takes up his abode in an old building on the estate. When the mansion of the countess is searched by the police there is found a note from Langeli to Ginetta: "I love none but you, for already you are my wife before God. My court to the countess is a means to obtain the passport necessary to our safe flight." Later, when the designing captain of police shows the missive to the countess she uncovers the hiding place of Langeli. Ginetta is unable to give warning in time, and Langeli is arrested.

Three years before Albano, pursued by revolutionaries, had found shelter and concealment in the home of Ginetta. He had given her a ring which he said might some day bring her favor. The maid goes to the duke and appeals for the lite of her lover. "You saved Albano. Albano shall save your lover," says the duke. He tells her he will order a mock execution and provide a passport for the two. It is here that the captain of police, in love with the maid, enters and threatens to upset the duke's plan. When the members of the firing squad empty their muskets the fugitive falls. The duke throws over the prostrate body his cloak. As the soldiers depart and the maid appeals to the figure on the ground to speak to her there is deep suspense. As he shows signs of life the captain of police appears. Laneli drops. The captain with his foot turns over the body. It is still. The captain embraces Ginetta. The figure on the ground moves. An arm reaches up and, from its scabbard, withdraws the sword of the captain. There is a short struggle. The sword pierces the captain. Over the parapet into the water scores of feet below the body is thrown and the sword after it. Langeli, with the mantle of the duke about him, and Ginetta escape.

The short and one-sided struggle between the contemptible captain and the man he had believed to be dead will cause a sensation in any house. So surely has the dramatist aroused against the captain the hatred of the observer that it is doubtful if there will be found any pity for the official who is thrown over the cliff. Space forbids enumeration of the many strong scenes in this splendid picture. Beautifully photographed, the settings will have unusual charm. There are fine interiors, artistic backgrounds. Of the latter, we have great gardens surrounding a palace—playing fountains and rustic bridges. The old fortress which appears in the conclusion of the picture is said to be the Chateau d' If. The acting calls for high praise, especially that of Mr. Cresti as Danielo Langeli. Mme. Dionne is the Countess Maddalena, Miss Pelisse is Ginetta, Jean Ayme is the captain of police, and Mr. Andre is the duke.

CROWDS AT ROTHAPFEL'S REGENT.

Those who are dubious as to the success of a big exclusive picture house in New York City should pay a visit to the Regent Theater, One hundred and Sixteenth Street and Seventh Avenue, where their dubiousness will undergo a complete change, resulting in a recognition of the fact that a well conducted picture house is a paying institution. Recently S. L. Rothapfel, director of the Regent Theater, has had to order the sale of tickets stopped on account of full houses. This is especially so on Saturdays, Sundays and holidays. When it is taken into consideration that the Regent has a seating capacity of over two thousand, that each entertainment usually consists of about an hour and a half and that the admission prices are 15 and 25 cents, it is a safe conjecture that the proper kind of picture theater will draw the crowds in any other big city and make a good profit.

Speaking about "crowds," it is a most refined class of people that patronizes the Regent. They are not the kind that are lured by the display of "blood and thunder" posters stuck in conspicuous places outside the picture house. Many of them come in automobiles.

Recently Mr. Rothapfel put on the George Kleine picture "The Last Days of Pompeii," for another three days. The business of those three days was a repetition of the tremendous business done with the first presentation of the picture by Mr. Rothapfel, the interim between the exhibitions being a few weeks. A great deal of the success of the picture is due to the fine sound effects Mr. Rothapfel has with such features. He always brings sound effects into play whenever the pictures will permit.

Incidentally, the Regent did good business during the holiday season just passed, and it matters not whether the days are fine or rainy, the house is always full.

"In the Stretch"

Ramo Four Part Picture Has a New and Very Popular Character in Phil Scovelle, Its Jockey Hero.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

WE predict that the newest Ramo feature "In the Stretch," will make a decided popular hit. It tells a story of racing life with its horses, track, stable boys, jockeys, owners, gamblers, and has the usual love story. Such a picture will naturally be compared with "Checkers," and won't suffer very much by the comparison; for, although it is not so well developed a story and has blurred lines in the last reel where secondary interests usurp the first place, its central character, Scovelle, has qualities that will endear him and the picture to the audiences. We think he has more drawing personality, both as written and played, than "Push" of "Checkers." That is tremendous praise, but it is given coldly and is our over-night judgment. Of the character, we may point out at once that he had every advantage in coming into the world; is a thoroughly eugenic character.

The name of the lad in the story is Phil Scovelle, a jockey. The story was written by Phil Scovelle, a jockey, so the author knew what he wanted to write about and was wholly in sympathy with his subject. Then it is played by Phil Scovelle, a jockey, and the actor who takes the part knew just about how such a character ought to act—we have the right to presume he did, for the boy is played by the actor with no constraint or unnaturalness and with a thousand convincing touches that make him most enjoyable company. These very favorable things more than overbalance the weaknesses of the scenario and so we have little call to dwell on the latter at this time. On the whole, it makes, in truth, a very likable offering; indeed, the first three reels of it are delightful and are full of the truest amusement quality.

Every good story of racing life pulls strong with the average spectator. In the first place, there is glamour of romance around a racetrack that is felt by almost every young human being whether he or she be "sporty" or not. It is like the sea, another great romance holder; though it is bitter enough to those who know it best, those who are young know only its thrills. It is natural that it should be so. Romance is an escape from life; it is youth's very soul, wants to have life all rose leaves and the race track is one of the greatest expidients that man has contrived to escape from the trammels of every-day life. Any good story of it written for the sake of its glamour is wonderfully effective amusement. There are other reasons why racetrack-love stories make good pictures—a horse is a dandy adjunct to a human love story; a star race horse, a horse that is loved is peculiarly so. When some villain is trying to dope the horse, dumb creature that he is and yet so fine, the appeal to tenderness in the spectator is marked. Lastly, the suspense of a hotly contested race is tremendous.

In this story, the boy, Scovelle, is at first the protege of the villain, played by Stewart Holmes; but refuses to "pull" races for him longer. The villain dopes a horse; it dies and Scovelle is sent to jail. After his release he saves the life of the daughter (Courtney Collins), of the district attorney, Hugh Jeffrey. Her fiance, Jack Hopkins, is being led astray by the villain and Scovelle warns him of the man's evil character. Jack's father is a minister (William S. Rising), from whom, later in the story, Jack steals money to cover racing debts. This is found out by Courtney and, in the least pleasing part of the story, he is saved by her from the consequence of his act. On the other side of the picture, Scovelle is rehabilitating himself by his work against the villain who is plotting to have the district attorney killed. The handling of this particular incident is extremely well done, especially the climax of it in which the district attorney, warned by the disgraced jockey, captures the gangsters who intend to shoot him at the restaurant and the police wound the villian in an exciting chase. Before the wounded scoundrel dies he makes a confession and this clears Scovelle.

Throughout all this there is a good deal of art, both in the direction and general management of the different scenes and in the playing which is more commendable for the average high level that it maintains and for the good team work that for any especial brilliance of individual players. The photography is clear and sufficiently life-like.

JOSEPH SMILEY.

COLONEL JOE SMILEY, actor, manager and director of the Lubin studio at Betzwood Manor, is a man of wide experience and strong personality. In the past he has held responsible positions with Klaw and Erlanger, Fanny Davenport, the Liebler Company and other high class producers. At short notice, the Liebler Company sent Smiley to Australia to put on the successful play, "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch." he also directed a photoplay studio in Havana. Since his association with the Lubin Company he has been assigned to the directing of big things such as battle pictures, one of which, "The Battle of Shiloh," employed nearly one thousand people. Another unique series of pictures was the "Buster" stories in which about twenty children between the age of two and ten gave wonderful performances. The Kiddie Company was organized, the playettes evolved, and children instructed by Smiley and the films had an enormous sale both in this country and England. Colonel Joe may well be proud of his Betzwood camp; it covers 500 acres of ornamental grounds with a manor house, conservatory and twenty other buildings, a two mile water front of the Schuylkill River and is stocked with over a hundred head of horses, also Jersey cows, sheep, pigs, wolvers, deer, pigeons, and all kinds of poultry. It is a wonderful estate and Smiley is the autocrat.

EDISON HAS NEW LONDON MANAGER.

Paul H. Cromelin, managing director of the Thomas A. Edison, Limited, of England, has resigned and is succeeded by A. F. Wagner, formerly assistant to Mr. Cromelin.

Mr. Cromelin took charge of the various Edison interests in the United Kingdom in the spring of 1911. Prior to that he was vice-president of the Columbia Phonograph Co., New York, with whom he had been associated for 15 years.

His first important work on arriving in England was to participate actively in shaping the Copyright Act then pending before the Parliamentary Commission, Mr. Cromelin being an expert in Copyright matters, having specialized for years on the subject of Copyright in its relation to mechanical devices. Many of the concessions to the industry in the Act of 1911 as finally passed are due to his initiative and efforts. Shortly after the Act was passed he assisted in organizing Universal Copyrights, Ltd., of King's House, Kingsway, being chairman of the organization committee and the unanimous choice of the talking machine trade as its first director. This company is now the copyright agent for every talking machine company doing business in the United Kingdom with one exception, and of a very large number of leading publishers and composers.

Mr. Cromelin also handled the Edison motion pictures for the London market and it was through his efforts that Harry Furniss, the celebrated cartoonist, was induced to come to New York and appear in a series of pictures made by the Edison Company.

"The Mexican Rebellion."

Three-Part Ammex Feature.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

THIS play is both timely and well written. More than that, the young actress who impersonates "Mercedes," the leading role, shows a fire and spirit in all that she does and carries over the high scenes in which she participates by sheer force of strong personality. It is not fair to others nor to herself to assert that she is a find, but all indications point that way. I should have to see her in a variety of roles before reaching mature judgment, but, so far as this one play is concerned, she is very decidedly a winner. She is attractive in appearance, has tremendous vitality, and is courageous enough to take chances.

Types like this young lady are very important—they are sometimes more important than knowledge of how to portray the dramatist's ideas. Personality counts so heavily in screen presentations that lack of it is ruinous, whereas the manner of acting is really of less importance than its vigor and enthusiasm in characterizations of the outdoor girl. One instinctively loves an interesting personality combined with physical charm — they constitute nature's lure — and, unless our attention is fastened by either what is innate in the performers or by the intelligence shown in their acting, we who sit in front care little what they do and still less what becomes of them.

The settings and general atmosphere of the photodrama are both exceptionally good, and there is much to be said in favor of the way the plot is worked out—there is undoubted constructive ability exhibited at times, but I can not speak so highly of the director's methods. He apparently does not grasp the full meaning of "conversion." Not to do him injustice—perhaps the playwright is at fault—and by way of helpful suggestion, I will explain how the play comes to pass rapidly over a period where it should dwell.

Mercedes is the daughter of a fiery old soldier, and has either inherited or become imbued with some of the paternal spirit. She longs to fight for a losing cause, to lead a desperate charge of discouraged troops and transform retreat into defeat. The best she can do is to cajole a young soldier of fortune, an adventurous American carrying despatches for the rebels, and try to effect his capture through federal troops in her father's command. When she finds that the squad sent for the capture is led by a Mexican she has reason to loathe, she experiences a change of sentiment and a change of volition. Such a change is important and difficult to handle. It is barely asserted in "The Mexican Rebellion."

Entirely too much hangs on this conversion, the entire plot, for such careless treatment. The audience will be sceptical and possibly convinced that the issue is forced, to the detriment of the desired effect. We are bound to accept what is shown, but we should be made to feel deeply that it is consistent and true. The handling of this important point is not conspicuously successful, whereas the fact that the whole story hinges on this radical change of attitude should have made it worthy of more consideration. This case is a typical instance of thousands, and is not cited to detract from the many other merits of the play, but to point out where similar productions can be strengthened, through critical judgment of the director rather than the creative impulse of the bright playwright.

MARGARET FISCHER.

Margaret Fischer, the beautiful and famous exponent of the art of pantomime, with an enviable reputation on the legitimate stage, has been engaged as principal lead in the Beauty Films. For the past three years Miss Fischer has been a featured leading woman, first with the Imp Company at the New York studios, and more recently with the Universal forces in California. In that time her work has improved so steadily that by now she is ranked with the highest experts in the art of silent expression. Being far beyond the experimental stage, and having acquired perfection in technique, she is in a position to enter her new duties with her mind free to consider the ultimate possibilities of the parts assigned to her, and to bring out all there is in them.

Margaret Fischer.

Miss Fischer shines particularly strong in romantic roles, but has also advanced so far into the realm of emotional work and tragedy that she must be considered among the leaders in that branch of the pantomimic art. Her first appearance in Beauty subjects will be under title "Withering Roses," released January 14; produced under the personal direction of Harry Pollard, who plays opposite to her.

The Beauty brand will become a part of the Mutual program.

GEORGE KLEINE TO OPEN BRANCH OFFICES.

Owing to increase in business, George Kleine will open a series of branch offices throughout the United States and Canada for the purpose of expediting the handling of his big feature attractions. Instead of handling these features as "Quo Vadis?" and "The Last Days of Pompeii" were handled, his branch offices will make their bookings direct and take care of all detail matters in the different territories. The branch offices will be located in the following cities: Seattle, Wash.; San Francisco, Cal.; Denver, Col.; Kansas City, Mo.; Memphis, Tenn.; Atlanta, Ga.; Minneapolis, Minn.; Buffalo, N. Y.; Philadelphia, Pa.; Boston, Mass.; Toronto, Ont.; Pittsburg, Pa.; Columbus, Ohio. Each office will be in charge of an efficient manager.

FROHMAN TO BARNARD DRAMATIC STUDENTS.

Daniel Frohman, of the Famous Players Film Company, was the guest of the Wig and Cue Club of the ladies of Barnard College on Friday evening, January 9, and delivered a brief discourse on the Shakespeare-Bacon controversy as it is regarded from the point of view of the dramatic profession and the making of motion pictures of Shakespearean dramas. F. F. Mackay, actor and author, was also one of the speakers.

"Paid In Full"

Eugene Walter's Drama Done in Pictures by the All-Star Company from a Scenario by Louis Reeves Harrison—A Most Satisfying Five-Part Production.

Reviewed by James L. Hoff.

ANY pardonable pride the writer may have in a creditable achievement by a member of the staff of the Moving Picture World should not be counted against that effort. We do not believe that it will be, especially in this instance, for those who may see the All-Star production of Eugene Walter's drama "Paid In Full," which has been adapted for a five-part motion picture by Louis Reeves Harrison, will realize that whatever praise we may bestow upon it is fully justified, and that Hr. Harrison's part in that production has much to do with its success.

Before considering the merits of the picture it is proper to take into account some of the frequently expressed opinions of Mr. Harrison on picture play construction. In a very recent issue of the Moving Picture World he said of the adaptation: "It steals the corpse of a great novel, or of a great play, and dangles the pulseless thing before our eyes to the accompaniment of loud publicity blasts."

William Riley Hatch as Capt. Williams.

This is a sweeping condemnation of the methods of adapters in general, of whom there are many, and quite naturally centers upon any effort that may be made by Mr. Harrison, the darts of all producers whose efforts are thus pilloried. It will be strange indeed if "Paid In Full" does not receive much critical attention as a consequence.

But Mr. Harrison reveals his purpose in the paragraph following the above quotation, in which he says:

> It may be safely assumed that the man who wrote the original work from which the adaptation is made had a message in mind and gave it form and treatment in accordance with the requirements of his time if not to suit himself at the moment, his main object being to "get over" his meaning with all the force at his command. Moving pictures can, however, more easily convey the message with entirely different form and treatment, can glorify a theme as an accomplished composer of piano music paraphrases a composition for orchestral performance, beautifying while making it more suitable for the new medium of interpretation.

Scene from "Paid In Full" (All-Star).

There you have the explanation of the Harrison method in a nut shell; he would clothe the pulseless corpse and give it life which, in plain words, means bringing it up to date. Following out this line of reasoning it is safe to assume that the subject which will not lend itself to such treatment is not adaptable to pictures from the Harrison point of view. How well he has succeeded in "reviving and clothing the corpse" in the present instance will eventually be decided by the patrons of the pictures, but the opinion of the reviewer is that a much clearer presentation of character has been accomplished in the picture version of "Paid In Full" than was obtained in the stage presentation.

Mr. Harrison has gone into this phase of the screen presentation at various times in his writings on the subject of character portrayal. In this instance he has made some research into the records of "Paid In Full" and has reached this conclusion:

Scene from "Paid In Full" (All-Star).

> Critics failed to understand the stage version, though the public felt its purpose instinctively. Mr. Walter did not at once present his central character because it was not possible within restrictions of theater methods, and his characterization of the weakling, Joe Brooks, was so clever that the critics were deceived. They thought he had set up a hero in Joe, and were shocked by his subsequent conduct. Listen to these vaporings, criticisms of the stage play:
> "Marry in haste and repent at leisure, might serve as a motto for Eugene Walter's 'Paid In Full.'" * * *
> "Joseph Brooks is a young man employed as a collector by Captain Williams, head of the Latin American Steamship Line. He is married to a nice girl, Emma, and they live amid the discomforts of a Harlem flat. They are too poor to afford a maid. Joe is discontented because others in the employ of Williams have received salary raises, while he has not.
> "Captain Williams was, it appears, formerly in command of a piratical Pacific sealer—a harsh wolfish cruel man. Joe steals from his employer because logical circumstances drove him to it. At length Joe confesses all to his wife and is driven to suggest that she go to Captain Williams to fix matters. Joe tells her that the Captain likes her—he likes pretty women," etc., etc.

Tully Marshall as Joe Brooks

Working from the premise that Walter did not intend Joe Brooks to be the hero of his play, Mr. Harrison has not only proved to us that he did not so intend, but that he did intend to place Captain Williams in that role. I do not know what may be Mr. Walter's thought on the subject, but do believe that, whatever his original purpose may have been with respect to his characters, he will, upon seeing the picture, agree that Captain Williams is the dominating character.

In bringing this truth to us Mr. Harrison has taken up the entire first reel and has portrayed most interestingly and convincingly the eternal struggle of the strong man against his baser passions. Of Williams, Mr. Harrison explains "that he has bought and paid for his experience with the gentler sex all the world over—he is a self-avowed sensualist in dealing with women. He is authoritative in dealing with men, but the fact that he advances them and that they stick to him indicates that there is an element of justice in his brutal nature. He is quite as human as Joe, with greater natural strength of character, his weakness being closely akin to that of his sex."

And so the pictured version of the play opens upon the character of Captain Williams just as he is recovering from a protracted debauch with his basest passions depicted in his sodden features. He is surrounded with bacchanalian impedimenta and is the personification of evil shrinking before truth as he cringes from the light of day when he opens the window of his apartment. Then, as if he were reading Williams' thoughts, Mr. Harrison has, by a series of dissolving views told the story of events which lead up to the first scene of the stage version, reverting back to the Captain between each vision and recording the workings of his mind as he battles with his sordid nature.

This characterization of the Captain is powerfully delineated in these preliminary scenes and impresses his personality so strongly upon the observer that there can be no doubt as to his dominating the main action of the play; thus interest is created in and centered on that character at the very outset, awakening definite anticipation which carries the mind on eagerly to the crisis.

I think that I have made clear Mr. Harrison's method: the necessity of creating and centering interest at the outset upon some character or motive sufficiently strong to hold that interest to the end. Any attempt to introduce a multitude of characters or to cloud the main story with subsidiary episodes destroys the interest and the picture.

Adapters of stage plays and stories have failed to recognize this necessity. They forget that the picture story lacks the printed words of the book or the spoken words of the play to explain what is otherwise unexplained; that every action in the picture must practically explain itself and, above all, must not obscure other action.

It will not be attempted here to recite the story of the play "Paid In Full." Briefly, Captain Williams covets Emma, the daughter of his business partner, for sordid reasons. She is loved by Jimsey, but marries Joe Brooks, a shiftless fellow. Captain Williams deliberately sets about to destroy Brooks that he may get the woman in his power. In this he succeeds, in so far as Joe is concerned, but the strong, quiet personality of Jimsey intervenes to prevent the destruction of the woman and in the end Williams is compelled to do the decent thing, however much it may be against his inclinations.

The cast of characters is quite notable, including Tully Marshall William Riley Hatch and Hattie Russell of the original cast of the play:

Joe Brooks	Tully Marshall
Emma, Joe's wife	Caroline French
Captain Williams	William Riley Hatch
Sato, Williams' valet	T. Tamamoto
Jimsey	George Irving
Mrs. Harris	Hattie Russell
Mr. Harris	Alfred Sidwell
Beth Harris	Winifred Kingston

The picture is conspicuous throughout for the consistent work of each member of the cast. Mr. Marshall never appeared to better advantage on the stage than he does on the screen and Mr. Irving's characterization of Jimsey is very satisfying in his quiet, commanding way. Nor should Miss French be overlooked in her portrayal of Emma which is true to the character.

The burden of direction, I am informed, fell to Mr. Augustus Thomas, and would indicate that he has quite mastered the art. Mr. Harrison's scenario has been followed closely, the only variance being the introduction of a scene to dispose of Joe Brooks before the final scene of the picture which shows Emma happy as the wife of Jimsey.

This subject is scheduled for release some time in February.

Universal Has Fire

Pacific Coast Cutting Rooms Destroyed—Girls Who Save Negatives Severely Burned. All Personal Property Lost.

Fire occurred at 10 p. m. Tuesday, January 13, in the Universal's studios at Hollywood, Cal., completely destroying the cutting rooms. Many of the girls, who were working in the cutting rooms at the time and who assisted in the saving of many valuable negatives, among which were "Samson and Delila" and "Richelieu," were severely burned about the hands and face. All who were working in the cutting rooms at the time lost their personal property such as purses and wraps.

The fire occurred through the blowing up of an electric heater. All workers were present at the time, laboring over the "Samson and Delila" and "Richelieu" negatives and positives, and it was due to the bravery of the employees that no more than a few small negatives were lost and that the fire did not spread to the closely adjoining buildings. The cutting rooms are in ashes. It is impossible to estimate the loss until a full inventory has been taken.

No part of the laboratory was damaged. The fire started so quick, however, and spread in the rooms with such velocity and fierceness that life was in danger for some moments. At the first indication of the fire all rushed to the negative rooms, determined to save the highly expensive feature films.

Isidor Bernstein, manager of the Universal Pacific Coast studios, was on the grounds at the time and directed the operations in saving films and putting the fire out. Immediately after it had been put down, he gathered his carpenters and mechanics around him and went to work to fix up temporary quarters to be ready first thing in the morning. He says there will be no delay in the regular work of the department.

When news was received by the Universal officials relating to the fire and the injury and loss of property to the employees, they immediately sent instructions, under the direction of President Carl Laemmle, to give every possible care and medical attention, and also to reimburse and reward those who had suffered loss. This telegram was sent to Manager Bernstein:

"Take immediate steps to reimburse girls and other employees whose bravery and loyalty in time of fire emergency caused them to sustain any personal loss. Also see that they get very best medical attention for burns or other injuries. Then give them suitable cash reward to show our appreciation of their prompt and unselfish actions. Hearty congratulations to you personally for your quick work in arranging temporary quarters for immediate resumption of work.

Carl Laemmle, Pres.
Universal Film Manufacturing Co."

ROTHAPFEL SAILS FOR EUROPE.

S. L. Rothapfel, manager of the Regent Theater, New York, which is noted for the excellence of its exhibitions, has gone to Europe to look over the exhibition field in the various countries. If there are any new ideas to be had from the European mode of motion picture presentation, Mr. Rothapfel will skim off the cream and bring them back with him. His tour will last about six weeks and will include London, Paris, Berlin, Rome and other important cities.

THE SELIG "RED-HEAD" SERIES.

There will be a Selig series of comedies, "The Red-Head," from the pen of William E. Wing, formerly the leading writer for the Biograph, who has become a big factor in the Selig writing force in Los Angeles, shortly released. These playful playlets were made at the Selig Zoo Studios in California and involve a demon child with the angel face, and the type of hair that gets what it goes after. The opposite to the red-head, and her deadly enemy, is Mickey, a part created by "Sid" Smith, formerly of Pathe, an animated bundle of springs.

Phillips Smalley Talks

Well-Known Director and Leading Man Visits Broadway for First Time in Months—Gives Interesting Interview.

By George Blaisdell.

BROADWAY must have looked good to Phillips Smalley, back in town for the first time in fourteen months. Mr. Smalley has been visiting his mother, Mrs. George W. Smalley. He arrived in time for the New Year, having spent his Christmas at his home near Los Angeles. Mr. Smalley is well known to picture lovers as the director and leading man in Rex productions the scripts of which are written by as the direction is shared by Lois Weber, leading woman. In trade circles it is more than an open secret that the Miss Weber of the screen is Mrs. Smalley in private life. The two members of this marital partnership make no attempt to conceal the relation or their mutual pride that such is the fact. Mr. and Mrs. Smalley were married nine years ago. They met in New York; it was a case of love at first sight. Both were fighting the battle of the metropolis — the uphill fight for first a living and then for recognition. They pooled their cares and also their hopes and aspirations. In the picture field they have been winning increasing reputation for two years and a half in one company. The secret of their success has been above all team work—backed up by a thorough understanding of picture technique and ability intelligently to apply it.

Mr. Phillips Smalley.

Mr. and Mrs. Smalley worked in the second Rex subject to be filmed. For many months following this they worked under the guidance of Edwin S. Porter, now the head of the producing staff of the Famous Players. Mr. Smalley unhesitatingly tells of the benefits he derived from his training under and association with the first Rex director. "I think Ed Porter one of the greatest masters of motion picture technique today," said Mr. Smally the day after New Year's. "I am sure those who understand his methods can recognize in our work touches that come from him."

Mr. Smalley's arrival in the East was coincident with that of the first print of "The Merchant of Venice." The Rex director unconsciously reveals his belief that this four-part picture represents the best work he and Miss Weber have done for the screen. In all truth, it is beautifully staged and costumed, well acted, and a remarkably faithful adaptation of Shakespeare's text. Talking with Mr. Smalley in the Universal's offices, just following a showing of the production, he expressed a belief that of all the plays of Shakespeare there was none containing less action than "The Merchant of Venice," especially for screen adaptation. When we suggested to Mr. Smalley that the Shakespearean subject from a pictorial viewpoint was splendidly conceived and executed and that from a dramatic standpoint apparently nothing worth doing had been overlooked, still from the human side, in deep appeal to the sympathy and in pathos, it did not approach "The Jew's Christmas," a Smalley production released last month, the Rex director admitted that he enjoyed portraying the rabbi a great deal more than he did Skylock. "The rabbi was much more human than Shylock," he said. "What appealed to me most in the rabbi's character was his tenderness." It may be of interest to know that the portrayal of Shylock is the result of President Laemmle's first viewing of "The Jew's Christmas."

Surely in Mr. Smalley's interpretation of the first of the dramatist's great tragic figures there is much material for pleasurable study. It is a portrayal that one will want to see more than once. Miss Weber, in writing the text, is said to have aimed to bring to the play a slight modern touch, but the language of the twenty-one players was the language of Shakespeare. Miss Weber made a charming Portia. Mr. Smalley was advantaged in making the production by the fact that he had seen Irving play Shylock forty-seven times and has also witnessed the performance of Forbes-Robertson and Sothern.

"In the early days of the screen acting was very much overdone," said Mr. Smalley in response to a question. "I always give as reserved a performance as possible, with as little gesture as will indicate what is taking place. I don't believe in acting all over the screen. I think more can be expressed with the pose of the body and a thought going from the brain through the eye to the audience than can be expressed by any series of gestures, excepting, of course, in scenes where great violence or great haste is necessary."

Asked as to news of players on the Coast, Mr. Smalley said: "Well, Little Mary is out there now. She is always a bright spot. Eddie August gave a party for her and her mother, and Little Mary gave one on Christmas. She is absolutely unspoiled, and she acts with the old charm she always had and with the old simplicity."

"Do you agree with many in the trade that the single reel is to be superseded?" we asked the visiting player.

"I think the single reel is unavoidable," was the prompt but diplomatically evasive reply. "The reel of the future is the natural-length reel. I have been unable to avoid spoiling a score of single reels by reason of the fact that the single was too long to permit cutting to a thousand feet and the intended double too short for two thousand—admirable material absolutely thrown away. I can safely say you will never in Mrs. Smalley's pictures find any padding, but that in no sense modifies what I said about the natural length being the true and logical picture. If we find our two-reeler is not good enough for two reels, Mrs. Smalley rewrites the story and we take it over again. It is a waste of time and money, but it has to be done."

Speaking of the opportunities on the screen for players, Mr. Smalley made a statement that not alone is interesting but which is sure to arouse discussion among the men and women who work before the camera. "A large majority of picture actors look upon the picture as a livelihood," he said, "and not as a career. I don't think the standard is made as high as it should be. I have noticed very often in Los Angeles, when directing a picture, there may be occasion to call to the attention of an actor the fact that he is not paying sufficient heed to the development of his part. He may say, 'Oh, that is the best I can do. I think it is all right.' That man is after his five dollars a day—not there for his art at all. It is only those who are willing to give everything they have who can hope to succeed before the camera. Furthermore, the time will surely come when you will not see bad acting on the screen."

Miss Lois Weber.

"Don't you think, Mr. Smalley, it is the simple story, devoid or nearly devoid of spectacular features, but containing real heart interest, that is the most popular?" we inquired.

"Positively, without a shadow of a doubt," was the ready reply. "Of course, it is essential sometimes to do things that are spectacular. For instance, in 'Just in Time,' we blow up a railroad bridge and do other things of the sort. Do I also believe in small casts? Most assuredly. Small casts, closer focus."

It developed in the course of the conversation that Mr. Smalley had at one time done newspaper work. "You know I come from a newspaper family," he said. We then realized why the name of the reserved man at the opposite side of the table had always had a familiar ring. At the same time we recalled the name of the man who was internationally known as the London correspondent of the New York Tribune and of whose copy we had nearly a score of years ago put many yards into type. "George W. Smalley?" we inquired.

"My father," replied the Rex director. "I was only eight days old when I was taken aboard ship by him when he first went to London. You remember, many years afterward he came back to New York as correspondent of the London Times."

OBSERVATIONS
BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN

THERE is a muttering of discontent among pianists and other players of instruments who are and have been working in motion picture theaters, on account of the introduction of instruments with numerous effects which can be so operated that one player, or operator, accomplishes satisfactorily as much as has heretofore been done by a full orchestra. Sympathy naturally goes out to those who find their means of employment and livelihood taken away from them by the installation of such productions of mechanical genius as are now being placed in so many of the up-to-date theaters; but sympathy is all the public can give them, and it would be folly for the members of the musical fraternity to entertain a hope that the public may be enlisted in a movement to withhold its support from theaters that install the instruments that are supplanting them in this respect.

The musical part of the programs in motion picture houses has been a subject of continuous criticism and none can hope to successfully defeat any movement looking to removal of the cause of these complaints. The attention of managers of motion picture houses has been repeatedly called to the great handicap placed upon their exhibitions by the wretched musical accompaniments furnished by incompetent and indifferent players. The effect of hundreds of very excellent photoplays has been often killed by the work of such people, and anything that can prevent this will receive the hearty welcome and support of the motion picture patrons and everybody sincerely interested in the welfare of the business.

A theater recently opened on upper Third Avenue has installed one of the new instruments. The writer visited the house and gave strict attention to the effect upon the audience of the accompaniments furnished by the operator of the new device. The verdict rendered was: "Why, that musical and trap work is alone worth the price of admission." The attitude of the audience was entirely different from that observed in most picture houses. The attention was concentrated upon the show, eyes fixed upon the screen, and ears alert to catch every note and effect produced by the one-man orchestra. The operator was a busy being. His whole time was taken up in manipulating keys to produce the proper sound at the proper moment, and at no time was he observed ogling the girls seated near him, or trying to attract the attention of the audience to himself by exaggerated posing.

It would be unfair to give all the credit for such results to the new instrument. The operators must receive recognition. If they are not intelligent and attentive to duty the instruments will fail in effect as much as the instruments played by the mashing, negligent and incompetent players; so, exhibitors contemplating adoption of the new idea must not treat the operation of the instrument with insignificance. The ingenious contrivance can be made an instrument of abuse as easily as the ordinary piano. The man behind the gun—or, rather, the man before the keyboard—must be on the job just when he is wanted.

For contrast, the writer visited another picture house and found the accompaniments were furnished by a very young woman seated at a piano. At her side was seated a girl friend, and almost all the time the picture was on the screen they were engaged in conversation, the back of the piano player's head being toward the screen as her fingers traveled uninterruptedly over the keyboard. Every scene on the screen was alike to the player and it made no difference to her if the departing spirit passed off with the accompaniment of a ragtime tune.

In passing out of the place the writer remarked to the manager that his piano player evidently made no attempt to keep in touch with the spirit of the pictures. "Vat do yer vant?" he exclaimed. "Dis is not der Medrobolidan Opera House. Vat do yer exbecked for den cends? The beobles come here to see the bigjures und ve tro in der music fer gude measure."

Unfortunately, there are too many exhibitors in the moving picture business of the same calibre as the one who made the quoted utterances. Appeals to them to aid in properly presenting picture plays by suitable musical accompaniments and trap effects are of no avail. They have no conception of management other than to get the best pictures available at the cheapest price and keep their eyes on the box office. Many exhibitors of this kind have the ludicrous notion that because their patrons are of the poorer and illiterate classes they cannot appreciate good music. A manager of an East Side theater told me that he could get along just as well without a piano. The instrument was silent one night, owing to illness of the pianist. Before the theater opened the next day a substitute was engaged. The manager confessed that the effect of the silence was awful to himself, as well as the audience. And bad accompaniments are just as horrible.

In response to criticism of piano players in picture shows, a player of some reputation said: "Don't put it up to the poor pianist. The exhibitors are to blame. Their policy is cheap wage and endurance tests. When the moving pictures came to the front I thought I saw a promising future for pianists. I realized that they would become an indispensable part of the exhibitions and I went into the business. I got good pay because I suited my work to the action on the screen. In time, others caught the idea, and I found my services were not as indispensable as I expected they would be. I was crowded out by players willing to work for less wages and longer hours. After drifting from one place to another, I was obliged to give up playing altogether because I could neither stand the strain, nor exist on the wages offered. The last place I worked in put me down for the count. I took it because I needed money and there was nothing else in sight. Believe me, when I tell you that I started hammering the box at 10 a. m., and kept it up until 11 p. m., with an hour for dinner and an hour for supper; and I am ashamed to say that the pay was twelve dollars per week. Slavery! Well, I should say so. But I was playing in hard luck and would probably have struggled along in the job a while longer until I could land something else if my successor had not come along and taken the job at nine dollars. I try to be reasonable, and do not challenge the right of exhibitors to get what they want at the lowest possible cost. That is their privilege. But many of them, in exercising that privilege injure their own interests by false economy. No piano player put to the endurance test I have experienced can perform satisfactorily. His muscles give out and the brain fatigue becomes so great that he cannot properly adapt his efforts to the action in the pictures. I agree that much criticism has been aroused by lack of intelligence or neglect on the part of pianists; but many players have been placed in a false light by inconsiderate exhibitors. The one-man instruments will be a boon to exhibitors who can afford to install them; but, take it from me, anyone who tries to get back the cost by sacrificing intelligence and endurance on the part of the operator will have nothing better on his hands than the much-abused piano."

AVIATOR PURCHASES PICTURE HOUSE.

Hugh Robinson, the veteran hydroaeroplane pilot, has announced his retirement from the field of aviation, and has purchased the New Savoy Theater and the airdome at 3919 Morgan Street, St. Louis, Mo. Besides being a designer and builder of hydroaeroplanes, Mr. Robinson is an experienced showman, having spent several years in that business. This aviator showman has arranged for a novel and original advertising stunt to be put into effect in the near future. He will fly over Forest Park and around his theater, scattering heralds pertaining to his show. He then will deliver a lecture at his theater, entitled "The Life of an Aviator; or, Behind the Scenes of Aviation." This lecture will be given under the direction of the Aero Club of St. Louis. Incidentally it should be stated that Mr. Robinson was the first man to carry United States mail in a hydroaeroplane.

NEW YORK REGIMENT TO GIVE PICTURE SHOW.

The 71st Regiment Veteran Association will give, at the armory of the 71st Regiment, New York City, on Friday, January 23d, an entertainment to raise funds for the memorial monument to Colonel Downs, late colonel of the regiment, during the Cuban War. The entertainment will consist of the following special feature films, "The Battle of Gettysburgh, loaned by the kindness of Mr. Kessell, of the New York Motion Picture Co.; "Jane of the Moth Eaten Farm," a comedy by the Universal Film Co., and loaned by the courtesy of the manager of their exchange department, Mr. Saunders, and the five reel feature "Victory," made by J. Parker Reed, Jr., loaned by Mr. J. F. Fairman, who is chairman of the committee to secure films for this entertainment.

The Home of the Vitagraph.

World's "Trouble Man" Makes Trip of Exploration and Reports Interesting Discoveries.

By F. H. Richardson.

EVERY day of the week, every week of the month, and every month of the year, thousands upon thousands of exhibitors, managers and operators view the works of the Vitagraph, and to them oft comes the question: Where is all this done? Whence come these beautiful productions? Where, and in what surroundings are they made? It is the purpose of the writer to answer these questions somewhat in detail.

To say that the Vitagraph studios are "in New York" is not sufficient, since that might indicate almost any spot in a territory fully thirty-five miles in length by fifteen broad; for Greater New York extends from the outermost end of Staten Island on the south, to the city of Yonkers on the north, and from the briny billows of the Atlantic on the east to the streamlet which Mr. Hudson discovered, quite some years ago, on the west.

Come with me, however, far over into the wilds (it is not really the "wilds," but wild sounds well and somewhat mysterious in print) of Brooklyn, something like five miles from Battery Park, and there we shall see, amid a setting of sparse forest, in which are dotted many homes of Brooklynites, a huge chimney, reaching far up towards the clouds. This is the needle which points to the aerie of the eagle—the home of the Vitagraph.

The entrance is through a low, gray stone building, and it is here that we encounter the ogre at the gate, Mr. W. J. Watkins, an old-timer in the service of the Vitagraph. To him we must give our pedigree from our remote ancestors up to and past the present into the future, to the extent of stating our business. If Brother Watkins' decision is not favorable there is naught to do but to retire into outer darkness and join the "nothing doing" crowd without the gates. But if the aforesaid ogre is satisfied with our credentials we may join the elect and pass on into a great central court, or yard, surrounded by mysterious looking buildings of gray stone, roofed, for the most part, with glass. We are now in the very lair of the Vitagraph, the aerie of the eagle, the nest in which this fierce bird hatches the eaglets shown all over the civilized world.

It was on this spot, six years ago, the Vitagraph made its home, commencing with one building, to which other structures have been added, from time to time, until now several acres of ground are occupied, and there are a dozen or more buildings all told.

The central court, or yard, is always a place of surpassing interest to the novice, for it is here we view a motley throng. Kings and queens mingle sociably with bedaubed and befeathered groups of "savage" Indians, low-brow politicians, and society people. We shall perhaps view a ferocious looking Indian chieftain, his face covered with the horrid war paint of his tribe, a long queue of feathers streaming down his back, accepting a proffered cigarette from Abraham Lincoln. Or mayhap we shall see King George playing leap-frog with George Washington. Queen Elizabeth sits on a convenient box in animated converse with a girl from the slums of the Bowery, or with a negro "mammy," whose "negro" only extends to the neck band of her waist. For these are the actors and actresses, made up and awaiting their turn or cue to take their parts in some one of the many scenes which are constantly under way throughout the working hours of the day.

Every once in a while we may see a huge auto-omnibus filled with an assortment consisting of perhaps plug-hatted society men, Malay pirates, women made up to represent persons in widely different walks in life, with perhaps a priest and a convict in stripes mixed in for good measure, shoot out of the yard—off to some distant point to take a "scene," or mayhap several of them, with nature, or some carefully selected setting of buildings for the background. Yes, indeed, this yard is always a place of absorbing interest to the novice. A trip through the great plant is also of much interest, for here one may see and examine the entire process of the making of moving pictures, from the whipping into shape of the scenario to the final projection of the finished subject on the screen. There are four of the old studio rooms, with the fifth, almost entirely of glass, just completed, and in each one of these rooms it is no infrequent occurrence to find from two to three scenes being filmed simultaneously. It is vastly interesting, as well as hugely amusing, to watch these performances. The actresses and actors are put through their paces several times in rehearsal, the director jumping hither and thither, shouting orders, illustrating desired action, and, in general, directing every movement of the force of employes in that particular scene. The camera-man stands idly beside his machine, apparently the only absolutely disinterested don't-care-whether-it-rains-or-not individual in the whole works, until the director shouts "ready!" whereupon he instantly springs into action and becomes the very personification of alertness.

Here one may step from the Indian tepee, with its group of picturesque squaws, in the heart of the wilds, around a piece of scenery into a Fifth Avenue drawing-room, where a society function is in full blast, and a few more steps will land him, like as not, into a low-class Bowery saloon, all of which is by no means lacking in interest to the visitor.

The business of the Vitagraph has grown so much during the past year that the company has just finished what is one of the most complete moving picture studios in America. The studio room itself is 120 x 60 feet, with sides and roof entirely of glass. The building, except for the glass work, is of cement and metal construction throughout. It is built in the form of an "L," the stem of which is the studio, one flight up. Immediately under the studio is the garage and repair shops, which houses the company's auto-trucks, automobiles and several motorcycles. In the basement of the foot of the "L" is a huge negative storage vault, 125 x 40 feet in size, where will be kept all the vast accumulation of negatives until such time as age has rendered them of no value. On the ground floor of the foot of the "L" is the shipping room, and six spacious dressing rooms, the dressing-room accommodations in this building being entirely for women, thus separating the sheep from the goats. Each dressing room is equipped with hot and cold water, porcelain basins and all conveniences, and there is a well-fitted bath-room, of goodly size, on each floor. The walls, floors and ceilings are of cement, neatly finished and painted in pleasing designs. The trim is entirely of metal and there is absolutely nothing inflammable in the construction of the entire building. On the next floor above are more dressing rooms, a costumer's room and an upholsterer's room. A portion of the dressing-room accommodations are divided off from the others by a solid wall, this being for the extra women, and thus we not only have the sheep divided from the goats, but we have the lady sheep also divided from the lady goats.

Pages could be consumed in an interesting description of this plant, but space is limited and there are many demands upon it, so I must be brief. I feel, however, that no story concerning the Vitagraph would be, by any manner of means, complete without mention of certain individuals who have had much to do with the building up of this enormous industrial organization and have contributed so greatly to its success.

First and foremost there is Mr. William T. Rock, president of the Vitagraph, familiarly known as "Pop" Rock. Speak to the average picture man of W. T. Rock and he will probably ask you "who is he?" To make yourself completely understood, however, you have only to say why, "Pop" Rock of New York, of course.

Friend Rock has a standing second to none in the moving picture field, and, while I shall probably stir up a small storm of protest by the statement, yet I think it is, nevertheless, a fact that Pop Rock comes pretty near being the Daddy of the whole works, since it was he who, I think, can claim the title of Pioneer in the exhibition of moving pictures in America. Whether Friend Rock really gave the first public exhibition of moving pictures in this country or not, I cannot say, but it is an indisputable fact, I think, that he was the first man to start a 10-cent moving picture theater and put the business on the regular theater basis which it now occupies. Mr. Rock was one of the members of the firm of Rock & Wainwright, who opened a moving picture theater on Canal Street in New Orleans in 1896. Mr. Rock has been actively identified with the business ever since; therefore, I repeat, he, nearer than anyone else, is the real father of the whole show. Those who wish to contradict this statement must produce facts and evidences, the same as "Pop" has done, and they will have to go a good way back to establish a prior claim.

Another, whose work in connection with the Vitagraph merits more than passing remark, is Mr. Albert E. Smith, business manager and treasurer of the company. Mr. Smith has general charge of affairs out at the studio, and all business matters of importance are brought to his attention and come under his direct supervision. The smallest detail of every department has to wiggle itself into a very good hiding place to escape his eagle eye. I say "eagle" eye because the eagle is the insignia of the Vitagraph Company.

Mr. J. Stuart Blackton is another, who is, at least in considerable part, responsible for the success achieved by the Vitagraph Company. With Mr. Smith he equally shares the responsibility of affairs at the studios and to his energy, activity and keen insight much must be credited. Mr. Blackton is also responsible for many of the large spectacular productions, and for this style of work he is peculiarly qualified by reason of his artistic knowledge and ability. Both Mr. Smith and Mr. Blackton read every manuscript passed on to them by the Scenario Department, and they supervise whatever production is made, carefully watching the development of each one, from scene to scene.

The Publicity Department of the Vitagraph is under the direct charge and supervision of Samuel M. Spedon, who is one of the busiest individuals of the entire Vitagraph staff. It is no exaggeration to say that Mr. Spedon has made for himself a very genuine and very valuable reputation in connection with his work as head of the department, which he, himself, created, organized and built up. This department was the first publicity department in connection with moving picture film production. Prior to its organization some four years ago, newspaper men had called upon the manufacturers and secured such data as might happen to be available. The entire time of Mr. Spedon and his force of five assistants is devoted to convincing the public that the Vitagraph films are about four-fifths of the whole thing. Of course, the publicity men of other manufacturers strenuously dispute this proposition, but Neighbor Spedon had a running start of them all which he has thus far manfully maintained. He carries, not actually but metaphorically, a banner on his back which reads: "Please Excuse my dust," thus announcing to all and sundry that he is the real Simonpure leader in publicity work, and that they are mere trailers.

Adjoining the publicity department is the negative department, and you may step over and get acquainted with its work. It is here many a puzzling play is made perfectly clear and logical by the proper adjustment of each part or scene in relation to the others. To this department must be credited much of the merit and success of the plays as they appear upon the scene.

Mr. Elmer L. McIntosh, the presiding genius of this department, while an exceedingly busy man, is never too much so to make us welcome, nor does he find it troublesome to tell us about his work and explain its mysteries. He is a veritable encyclopedia of the motion picture business, with which he has been actively connected ever since its beginning and has served in many capacities. Ten minutes with him and his work is well and profitably spent when we want to know anything about moving pictures.

Up stairs in the studios, during the taking of the different scenes of the different pictures, we are apt to notice a very active, though somewhat stout gentleman, busily engaged in the arrangement of the different settings for these scenes. This is Mr. Charles Chapman, the Vitagraph scenic expert, who is a wonderful worker in his line. We doubt if his superior can be found. He is an artist of great ability.

And so on we could go mentioning the many names of men who occupy important positions of this great plant, but the limitations of space forbid.

The work of Mr. French, superintendent of the studios, who has immediate charge of all mechanical matters, is also deserving of extended mention. Aside from his undoubted ability in his work, Mr. French is what our friend, the Swede, would term "one darned good faller."

In a glass of sparkling wine, I offer this toast to the Vitagraph Eagle: May its scream long be heard, the fire of its eye remain undimmed, and its plumage lose none of its magnificent splendor.

PATHE CAMERMAN IN MEXICAN BATTLE.

Pathe's weekly cameramen are evidently a live lot. Following on Miller's feat in Trinidad, Colo., of being in the midst of a battle between strikers and deputy sheriffs comes news from the Texas man, Steene, to the effect that he crossed over into Mexico from Laredo and got mixed up in a hot battle between federals and rebels. Several telegrams came in recently from him the latest being as follows:

"Fighting here continuously. Got 100 meters this A. M. Was only 200 yards from the firing line showing both rebels and federals in hot action. Fall of city seems certain within a day or two. Strongly urge you to let me stay here. Good stuff."

Another telegram states that about 200 men have fallen in the battle. The Pathe people are looking forward with interest to Steene's films.

CHANGE IN WARNER'S FEATURE MANAGERS.

Charles Goetz succeeds J. A. Nicoll as resident manager of the New Orleans office of Warner's Features, Inc. Another official change in managers has just taken place in Los Angeles. Fred C. Dawes, an old film man, recently connected with the Mutual offices in Los Angeles, succeeds Byron Park, resigned.

Writing to Bill.

RECENTLY Bill wrote us about a couple of things, and while we don't wholly approve of his putting "expert" in quotation marks, the rest of it reads pretty well. This is what he wrote:

> Glad to get your letter and very pleased with the advice about the house. You see we were in trouble so to speak. I was for continuing the old management and keeping the policy of the house about the same. We are and were running the house about $450.00 gross with operating expenses about $225.00—fifty-fifty break. Comes one of my associates and an old head at the game. He wants to fire the old manager and install himself there. Well, everyone knew the former people and liked them—I couldn't see it but the influence of your letter as an "expert" swung the tide in my favor. Sometime I want to tell you about our place and send in some advertising. We are running Universal service—change every day—4 reels. Sunday 7 reels and it is too much. We lost about $40.00 last Sunday and will tomorrow and next Sunday because we can't get all the people in. This change has been made so there won't be that to contend with in the future.

In Reply.

And so we sat down and this is what we wrote after "Dear Bill:"

Dear Bill:—I told you in my last that silent partners very seldom were silent. It's evident that you have some of the talkative kind and I'm glad that a letter written before I knew of the condition you faced enabled you to hold the old manager and steer the silent partner out of the general run of the house. You've passed the crisis, but I look at it this way: The new minister never does preach quite as good a sermon as the old one and the new grocer's sugar is not ever as sweet as the stuff the old one used to sell.

The man you've had has been turning up a good profit and giving satisfaction. At the present it would be idiotic to throw him out and it would be a foolish move at any time, unless you find you have to hold him by the throat with one hand, with the other hand on the cash register. The moment you put a new man in you get all the friends the old manager made plenty sore. They can't be convinced that he can possibly do as well as the old man and he has got to do so much better to even make good that he'll strain his left lung or his good intentions.

On top of this you have several other silent partners, each of whom secretly thinks he can run the house better than Jones is doing it. He has the same money in the pot that Jones has, but Jones is milking the kitty and they all will want to take down as much as Jones does and pretty soon, instead of a pot there will just be a hole in the table dug by their finger nails, clawing their money back.

If you have a lot of silent partners, be careful that each gets precisely what the others get. If Smith gets a penny stamp to mail a post card with, give each of the others one green stamp or pretty soon it will be asserted that Jones is getting all the best of it and the silent ones will slip the skids under your brogans in a way that will shock your soul and injure your prospects.

On Losing Forty.

But you seem to have steered a safe course on the silent ones, and I'm glad to see that somewhere someone has a little sense about the twice-as-much show. Since you say that you lose $40 on Sunday, I take it that you run seven reels at the regular speed. This is bad enough, but it is not half as bad as running six reels an hour, or even less. There is a place I could show you not far from here where they will run six reels in forty-two minutes, get the audience out and a new one in in the other three, and do it again.

In the first place I don't believe that the average man wants seven reels when he goes to a show. In the second place he should not be given seven reels if he wants them and in the third place you can't show seven reels and show them right and make money, and if you don't show them right you are a thief.

If you go to a grocery store and ask for a pound of butter and get oleomargarine and want to make a yelp, you can get a chap with a shiny badge to come along and give the grocer a chance to work his political pull keeping out of jail. If you violate the pure food law, you can be pinched—though it doesn't generally happen, but if you skin a man on the show you give, there doesn't seem to be any redress.

And yet the man who runs seven reels in seven minutes each is selling spurious goods just as surely as the man who says oleo is butter or that his beans are not flavored with benzoate when he knows blamed well they are.

You are not selling butter or beans. You are selling entertainment. If a man comes to see your show he's entitled to see it and if you run it so blammed fast that he can't, you are swindling him just as much as though you sold a mixture of lard, suet and some other stuff for butter.

You're a cheat and a sneak thief if you do not give a man the entertainment you profess to sell and it assuredly is not entertainment when the film is run so fast that you almost see the girl entering the library in scene 19 before she's out of the auto in number eighteen.

It seems to me that a lot of people are running picture shows in the mistaken belief that the audiences are the gosh-blamed dunces instead of themselves. Not all men are fools nor are all fools without their moments of sanity. That's stealing Abe Lincoln's stuff, but he's too dead to care and I don't worry about what Ralph Ince or Francis Ford will say. If you want to sell a show you'll have to have a show to sell, and you can't keep on selling the St. Vitus dance. Kick back to four reels or even three, and run them right, and you'll have more money next New Years than you have this. That seven reels in forty-nine-minutes thing is all right for the store faker, but there is no permanent bank account in being a store faker.

Sunday is the best day in all the show week. That's the day the people must have their shows and the very best, most permanent and lasting patron you can have is the man who comes to you because the other fellow takes him for an ass. "Thanks for the lobster"—I'm smoking one of 'em now. Keep on going right and the crowd will run after you even if the way seems sort of lonesome right now. Like the old copybooks used to say, "dare to do it right."

Clean Cut.

This explanation from the Cameraphone bulletin is clean cut and to the point. Don't apologize for charging ten cents for a ten-cent show or better, but explain why you have to do it and few, if any will complain. If you cannot use it at once, save this up. You'll not always give five-cent shows:

> Recently we have been charging ten cents on many days when formerly the admission was but five. Some people got the impression that our reason was simply that a dime looked better to us than a nickel. It does, but that is not the reason. You, no doubt, know that during the past few months better and more expensive films are on the market. We cater to an audience that demands the best and the best naturally has to be secured by us at a greater cost.
> In no case do we charge a dime for a show that we formerly were able to put on at half of that price. There are so many good pictures on the market we feel our patrons should see that it is harder and harder for us to make a selection. We often pick one out of half a dozen offered to us when we feel that all six would give pleasure to our friends. With Daniel Frohman, Augustus Thomas, Klaw & Erlanger, Geo. M. Cohan, Burr McIntosh, Geo. W. Lederer and others turning out photographic treats and the great many wonderful pictures that are being imported, we will soon have to demand twelve days per week to keep up with the parade. You can come to the Cameraphone at any time and be assured of a good show, but when you see the ten-cent sign out don't hesitate. It's an extraordinary good show.

The Cameraphone Greeting.

The Cameraphone Christmas greeting this year was a sheet of odd textured paper six by nine inches and folded to make an eight pager with uncut leaves. On the first page was a half tone of Miss Mary Fuller and a tiny calendar. The middle pages carried a list of the Cameraphone houses and a simple greeting. There was nothing else, just the picture and good wishes. They certainly do know how to do things down in Pittsburgh even if they do not seem to know how to put our name back on the mailing list. We don't like to threaten or blackmail, but if we are not put back on the mailing list pretty soon we are going to send John Bunny the picture of him they printed on a recent front page. Bunny, with bright golden hair and baby blue eyes—you should see it!

Should Thank Universal.

Several managers should thank the Universal—we believe that Mr. Stevenson is the one—for discovering what an effective front page can be made with an all black cut. The Fichtenberg Spotlight is the latest to use the scheme.

Some Present.

The Dixie Theater, Benham, Texas, beats the free Christmas Matinee. Instead of a free ticket, every patron was given a ticket admitting one adult to the theater without charge, not any day, but every day of Christmas week, including Christmas day itself. There was no prize drawing or anything of that sort, but an absolutely free gift of a weekly pass. This takes a good bit of nerve, to throw away a good part of the Christmas receipts, but think of the result of having the whole town talking about it. One ticket was delivered to every house in the town. You did not even have to ask for them.

A Christmas Benefit.

W. H. Sarnum and Son, who manages the Park Theater, Avon, N. Y., gave their employees a benefit, the day's receipts going to the house staff. They write:

> We feel that this was quite a success, and are writing you that others may profit by the scheme if it has not been tried already. The feeling between employees and management is of best, and we know they are working every minute for the best interests of our theater.
> We might add that special tickets were printed and employees were very successful in disposing of same.

This is the sort of spirit that builds up a loyal and efficient staff. The man who works for you gives you something more than you pay him for if he has the right spirit himself, and he likes to feel that his efforts have been appreciated. You can pay an employee for his services, but you can't pay him for his loyalty, for that is something that is not measured by dollars and cents. You can show him that you are appreciative, and you can show friendliness in return, but you can't pay for loyalty with money—you must deserve it.

Have you a bunch of hired men or have you a staff of co-workers?

More Help Wanted.

Now the Cozy Theater, Marinette, Wis., wants to get in line with a program and asks the assistance of managers who already have publications. Will those who have so generously responded in the past please do so again? Every decent piece of advertising helps the business generally as well as locally. Help those who would help the business while helping themselves.

Will Continue.

This from the Academian, Selma, Ala., the house organ of The Academy of Music:

> The Academian was planned for fifteen weeks' existence, after which time it was the intention to continue it or not as the reception given the little paper might warrant. With this issue it reaches the end of its volume, but not the end of its existence.
> It happened that last week a few more or less unavoidable things combined to delay the issue so that it could not be distributed at the Saturday matinee, as had been done in the past. The great number of inquiries for the paper together with the apparent disappointment at its not being ready, makes us believe that it is wanted by a number of people, anyway. And trying to hand out anything which may be wanted has many times been explained as being our philosophy, motto, desire, object, religion or what not. And so the paper continues.
> Merry Christmas.

This is good news. The Academian is one of the best edited of the weekly photoplay programs. It has personality, it shows intelligent thought and we think that it places the pictures and picture theaters in an entirely new light with many of the residents of the town who did not hitherto know how good a good photoplay theater could be. It is a patronage-making publication that is a credit to the business at large. We are glad that we do not have to write its obituary but that instead we may chronicle its continuance.

What we mean by patron making is exhibited in this paragraph from the same issuue:

About "Robin Hood."

> And that trying to give, etc., brings up the matter of "Robin Hood." We are running this picture entirely because we believe it a good one, and one which you will like. It is not a part of our service, nor even handled by our exchange, but if we did not show it, it would not be exhibited here. For be it understood that the picture is a special production for which the exchange demands, justly we believe, quite a bit advance rental—a thing that is not of interest to you, nor even to us, quite so much as is the merit of the picture itself. But it should interest you that, special production though it is, there will be no advance in the admission price on next Saturday.

That's the sort of stuff that makes a man feel that he is not only welcome, but wanted.

Gentle Hint Stuff.

As we said before, we used the last of our De Subers catchlines some weeks ago.

Booms Cards.

The Virginian Theater, Petersburg, Va., issues a card with a picture of a favorite player, the list of the week's attractions and an offer of fifty cards of the Mutual players for twenty-five cents. There is a profit in the cards even at that price, and the Virginian seems to realize that by helping the patrons to become fans they are clinching their clientele. Anything that rouses interest in the personality of the players helps to make and hold business.

Doing Nicely.

E. R. Hardwick, of the Lyceum Theater, Clovis, N. M., wishes to thank those who responded to requests for programs. To prove that he has profited by the courtesy, he sends a number of his programs. He adds that the wall paper handbill, which he got from this department, brought him a packed house. We do not at the moment recall the name of the manager in South Carolina who sent in this idea, but we are sure that he feels gratified to realize that he has helped brother managers all over the country to better their business. This is the most pleasant feature of this department, the fact that you can spread your influence not alone over the nation, but in remote corners of the world and win the thanks of thousands. Did you ever stop to think that when you tell your idea here you tell it to practically every manager of a photoplay theater in the country? Just think it over and if you never have sent in anything send something along.

News and Stories.

Mr. Hardwick uses a broader sheet than most, a nine by twelve page. The full program is boxed in on the right of the first page with chat in the other column. The other three pages are largely given to the stories of the film with about half a page of miscellaneous matter on the fourth page. Here are some clippings to pay back what he has borrowed:

> Your face is your own, of course,
> You may treat it as you like.
> But a smile you know you owe it,
> And you surely ought to show it,
> At the Lyceum movies tonight.

Here is how he makes them stick:

> SAVE THIS PROGRAM.
> It Means Money Saved.
> We are printing this program at no little expense, and it is our plan to have you keep the program all week. We will therefore give each person who presents this program to the door man at the Saturday matinee one free admission to that show. Commencing with the issue of November 24, the programs will be distributed only on Monday night, and each one will be good for a ticket to the Saturday matinee. You can save money by coming to the show Monday night. Get the habit.

After that they have to hold it all the week.

Later the program was moved over to page two, the stories dropped and the descriptive lines amplified, which we think is a much better scheme. To tell the full story is to rob the film of the suspense that makes it enjoyable. It is better to pique curiosity and leave it unsatisfied than to tell the entire tale, a fact that Mr. Hardwick seems to have grasped.

Other Matter.

Mr. Hardwick supplements his program with daily dodgers. The wall paper was used for "Uncle Tom's Cabin," but almost as gaudy is his statement that "Campaigning with Custer" is Multiextramagnificent. We'll bet Bert Williams likes that word. Several of the Williams coinage are used and Motofilmic, the word that put Williams on our map, is split and used as "Moto feature" and "Filmic Masterpiece." Some one of these days there will have to be a new dictionary written to get all the new words in. Mr. Hardwick's dodgers offer no particularly strong point, but they are all well balanced and set with care. We hope that he puts us on the mailing list and keeps us there.

Likes Us.

Here is a letter from Guy W. Mahoney, of the Palm Theater, Missouri Valley, Iowa. He writes:

> Find enclosed two samples of some of my advertising. Since reading so much about the weekly program sent out in advance I have been trying it for the past few months with great success. I think the best method is to change the style of the program. For instance: I sometimes get it out on a common cardboard, sometimes on a "once folder" and again like the enclosed. I read with interest the method of trying strings in them and hanging them on the doors, but I have found the one-cent stamp gives the best results. It carries the impression that they are individually solicited. Each week I send a photo along with the weekly program. Of course of a licensed player who will appear on the program for that week. Aside from the program, I use space in the daily paper here and I make it a point to have my program for one day in advance published in the paper. The daily in this city has a circulation of 350, which isn't bad for a town of thirty-two hundred. I also enclose a sample of the space used in the daily.
> Can't get along without the World, and I have gotten a good many valuable ideas from it. Hereafter I will send in anything that I think worth while for the other exhibitors. Would like to have you comment on the enclosed samples.

There are two ways of working the program scheme. One is to have the same thing each week, the other to be as different as possible and keep them guessing. The "always" program has an advantage in that it is quickly recognized as an old friend, but on the other hand if you can ring the changes, the wonder what you will do next keeps them guessing. In the specimens sent in, the program is a six-page with two folds. The front bears the name of the house and the town. The back page has the chat reproduced below and this greeting. We particularly like the suggestion that they scan the program and plan their evenings for the entire week.

> On account of having an exraordinarily good line of pictures for this week we are taking this method of telling you about them.
> Read this through and plan your evenings for the entire week.

This is the argument:

> We have saved this small space to have a heart-to-heart talk with you. As you already know, we are showing the best motion pictures obtainable. We are making this theater as comfortable for winter as your own home by using our steam heating system and inside storm doors. Our own lighting plant assures you that your evening's entertainment will not come to an abrupt halt on account of the city lights going out. All this has been done for your and our benefit, and if there is anything in connection with this theater that can be improved on we solicit your criticism. Ask all the questions and advise us all you can. You know your wants better than we do. Thanking you for your time in reading this, we remain.

This is on a yellowish brown card with black ink. Another sample is on blue fabric paper and printed in Typo. Only half of one page (the page being five by six and a half) is printed and the sheet is folded so that the blank side is presented when drawn from the envelope. It announces Miss Fuller in "Mary Stuart." It is oddly done and must have attracted attention.

Results.

Mr. Mahoney seems to consider results before costs and prefers the postoffice. This is not always practicable in larger towns where a thousand or more announcements are distributed, but where it is practicable the mail always is best, for the matter at least gets into the hands of a responsible person.

We shall be glad to see more of his offerings. He's in a small town, but he has "big time stuff."

"Some ad," is the comment William Lord Wright makes on a full page advertisement from the Springfield, Ohio, Sun that he sends in, and we echo "Some ad." It announces the opening of the Majestic Theater on Christmas day and takes up an entire page, with an ornamental frame in line cut and four half tones of the players that might have been better printed. This is a 900 house, a sister theater to the Princess, which shares the advertisement and the fact that the Majestic will open Christmas is made to stand out like the proverbial sore thumb.

THE PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

St. Louis Wants.

THIS letter from Karl R Coolidge presents an interesting suggestion, but we confess that we do not believe that the scheme of forwarding a story to the next port of call will work out well. It has been tried in fiction work but very generally abandoned. Like all the others, Mr. Coolidge does not want to be bothered with a mass of junk. We do not suppose that stating that fact will have any effect, for naturally the author does not believe that it is junk. Mr. Coolidge's remark that now that the rainy season is on requires the elimination of interior scenes may seem a bit surprising to many. Please remember that the West Coast companies mostly work open-air stages. They can get exteriors in between showers, but it is not possible to strike and set scenes. Here is the letter. We think that Mr. Coolidge means to say that scripts sent in without stamped and addressed envelopes will be returned unread and not those with, as his letter states:

> I will appreciate a statement in your column to the effect that Frontier is in the market for scripts, and is willing to pay top-notch prices for high-class stories. In comedies we want Western farces for J. Arthur Nelson in his "Slim" series. In dramas, for Mr. Robards, powerful Westerns and Spanish. All our productions are single reels. Hereafter, all photoplays found unavailable will be returned within a day after being received, and a decision on those held will be given within a week. We have an iron-clad rule that scripts submitted with self-addressed and stamped envelopes will be returned, BUT UNREAD. We do not care particularly whether a writer has sold scripts or not, but the so-called authors who flood us with a continuous mass of junk will not find favor here. As an incentive to authors we make this proposition: That photoplays submitted to us and found unavailable, will be forwarded, without rejection slips, to any other stated company, provided a stamped and addressed envelope to that company has been enclosed. This should save Eastern writers considerable time that would otherwise be spent in the mail, but this privilege should not be abused by sending us stories entirely out of our nature. Further, we are willing to read synopsis only, but if scenario also is sent see that the synopsis gives a clear insight into the story, and not a Chinese puzzle to induce us to read the entire script—which we do only when the synopsis shows possibilities. The rainy season is on now in California, and this means that interior settings should be dispensed with whenever possible. This applies to all West Coast companies. All scripts should be sent direct to Santa Paula, California, and not to St. Louis.

Going Away.

Will the readers of this department please note that this writer is leaving town January 20th and will be gone about three weeks, during which time letters and technical questions cannot be replied to, though the department will be continued as usual.

At the Ed-Au Club.

The Ed-Au Club held its third regular meeting January 3d, at Keene's Chop House, President Phil Lang presiding. Those present were James Cogan, Mark Reardon, George F. Hennessy, E. J. Montagne, George L. Sargent, E. M. Weeks, Henry Alfred Phillips, Arthur Leeds, Hanford C. Judson the Rev. Dr. Stockton, Jack J. Clarke and Epes W. Sargent.

At the business session Dr. Stockton and Mr. Judson who were proposed at the preceding meeting, were duly elected, as were Mr. Phillips, E. M. LaRoche, of the Motion Picture Story Magazine, E. W. Matlack and Miss Eliza G. Harral, of New Orleans.

It was decided that there should be no non-resident membership but that writers everywhere should be eligible for active membership, while writers for the motion picture press should be eligible as associates without regard to residence.

At the discussion that followed George L. Sargent, who was in all the glory of evening dress, because he was going to the Universal Ball, told of three fades, one into the other, and was in turn told of some twenty fades into each other done by Edison. There was some discussion as to the question of a rejection slip that should eliminate the misleading "we shall be pleased to see anything further you may care to submit," but it was agreed that this would have no effect on those it was most urgently desired to kill. Some discussion as to prices led to nowhere in particular, but it was agreed that the present craze for the use of copyrighted novels and stories written by or attributed to authors of note would not permanently or seriously affect the actual photoplay writer.

Adjournment was had to Saturday, February 7th.

Regular English.

Two writers have commented on Mrs. Brandon's statement that Eclair wanted stories "with guts." They profess to be much shocked. We do not believe that this will bother Mrs. Brandon much. It is not a pretty word, but it has a meaning that cannot be translated and we let it stand because we could not get another word or, for that matter, a paragraph that would exactly replace it. We hear much of the story "with a punch." The story with guts is a story that is pervaded with the punch, that is, solid and complete and not merely a shell. It is accepted by newspaper and fiction editors as regular language along with "bully," "rotten," "punch," and other useful but possibly inelegant words. Those Mrs. Brandon sought to reach know what the word means, and get her idea more clearly from that than they would from any other word or phrase. The others do not matter.

The Los Angeles Selig Studios.

By Marc Edmund Jones.

The Selig Polyscope Company maintains two studios in Los Angeles, Edendale, and the animal farm. The Edendale studio is located on Allesandro Street, about two blocks above the New York Motion Picture plant, and is permanently built with a glass studio, an auxiliary open stage, and Mission style offices and quarters. A handsome Mission wall surrounds the lot. Here Director Edward J. LeSaint is putting on stories with Stella Razetto and Guy Oliver. Director Colin Campbell works here with Bessie Eyton and Wheeler Oakman, but is in Arizona at this writing putting on some special stuff, and the third company has been laid off with the coming on of the bad weather.

The animal farm is at Eastlake Park, about a fifteen minute car ride north from the main part of the city, and three of the directors are working here. Selig Zoo, as this plant is to be called, is under construction, and the stages, dressing rooms, and other quarters are temporary frame buildings. A tremendous plot of ground is being cleared. The animals will be kept in permanent, artistic cages in the front of the lot and a scenic railroad and several other features will transform that part into an amusement park and public zoo, from which the income is expected to help keep the animals, and prevent the tremendous charge against the animal pictures. Behind the part to which the public is admitted, the stages and studio facilities will be placed, and the directors working here will have the animals available. A Mission wall duplicating Edendale will be placed around the whole.

Director F. J. Grandin is putting on the "Adventures of Kathlyn" in a million reels, working with Kathlyn Williams, Charles Clary, Thomas Santchi, and Lafe McKee. Director E. A. Martin is working with Adele Lane, William Stowell, and Edwin Wallock. Director Norval McGregor is working with Harriet Notter, Francis Newberry, Barney Furey, Lillian Leighton, and John Lancaster.

The Selig scripts are all purchased in Chicago, being sent to the company at 20 East Randolph Street, Chicago, Ill. They are purchased without reference to the director and are bought ahead of requirements. Mr. Wm. N. Selig personally passes upon them, and any type of a story is apt to be bought. Stories of the under-dog that wins his way to ultimate success, pretty stories of real life, and stories of any kind with a sort of pleasing atmosphere are most likely to meet with his approval.

As with the Selig Company, the Vitagraph Company, located in Santa Monica, has taken in a reef until the bad weather is over, and a part of the force has been laid off. Manager Rollin S. Sturgeon is again personally directing pictures, and one other director, U. Davis, remains. As scenarios are purchased through Brooklyn, except on rare occasions, and as there are two staff writers at Santa Monica, this plant is of little interest to the free lance. The Western Lubin, the Santa Paula (California) Frontier, and the Niles Essanay (San Francisco) have not been visited by this writer. The Biograph is still in the east, and feature and newly established companies are not to be included in this series.

Keeping It Dark.

Here is a little experience meeting from a New York writer, who says:

> I have started several times to write of my progress and each time have torn up the letter, owing, as I looked it over, to lack of progress to write about. I have sold three scripts during the year for a total of $30 and on the other side of the ledger there is a $100 Remington typewriter to pay for which was burned up in a fire about the same time of the fire in Hollywood, and also some dollars in postage, not to speak of scripts returned, so you see I am in bad quite a sum financially. But I have come to the conclusion that I am the one to blame and here is how I got wise: I was fortunate enough to get a copy of your "Technique of the Photoplay" for a Christmas present and opened the book, as it happened, at page 141, where it explains about the chef who was a nobleman. Now I have written three stories along that line, that is, I introduced a character in the middle of the story, saving his identity for the big scene when it was disclosed, and as I thought would keep the audience guessing and get a big laugh when he became known, but I see by the book that I am wrong and possibly that I should have looked at it like this: "I should have let the audience see who he was and let them enjoy the fun, as the actors on the screen are not supposed to know who he was and the surprise should be to them, and not the audience, who enjoy the way the actors take the disclosures, as the case may be." Am I right or am I still in the dark? I have just received back a script of that sort from Edison, after being held seven weeks, and also another from Majestic, which they notified me was held for consideration and possibly the reason that I stated above was the reason of rejection, and I hope that I have at last got the right dope on the game at last.

It is not possible to set forth any rule that does not possess some exceptions, but as a general thing it is well to remember always to keep the audience posted. To take the McCloskey script mentioned by this writer, "Auntie's Affinity." We know all along that the man whom Auntie supposed to be a nobleman is really the chef at the hotel where she resides. It will be remembered that this fact is disclosed to her when her niece finds in her pudding the ring that the chef intended for Auntie. When he claims the ring everyone knows all about it and the laugh is immediate. If this scene had been the first to show that Peitro was the chef, there would have been a pause in the action while the audience assimilated the fact that the supposed nobleman was in reality the chef, but knowing all along that the affinity is the chef, the laugh is immediate and unpuzzled. More than that, from the first moment of the meeting in the park we have known just how matters stood, we have known that Auntie must eventually discover the imposition and to the actual comedy on the screen there has been given the additional comedy of anticipation. Each time Auntie and the Count met there was a chuckle, as we thought what Auntie would say and how she would feel when she found out, and this helped the visual comedy more than a little. No laugh can be gained that must be immediately preceded by an introduction, and the mystery should always be confined to the players on the screen, and yet Mr. McCloskey gained an additional laugh by turning around in the last scene and explaining that the man really was a count as well as a chef.

It is this need of identification and the posting of the audience that makes it necessary to establish identities early in the first reel, just as it is better to show a letter when it is written rather than to wait a few scenes until it is read.

Take, for instance, the story of an over-important young man who is given a letter to deliver to some third person. We watch him deliver the letter and see him kicked out of the office, he calls a policeman and the man who did the kicking is arrested but let go when he shows that the letter apparently came from the man who handed it to him and called him several kinds of a thief.

There might be a laugh when the man is kicked out and probably there would be one when the letter was finally shown.

Look at the other development: The young man has been shown in several situations in which we develop a dislike for his self-importance and hope that something will happen to take him down. Now the letter is written and given the victim for delivery, but not before we have had a chance to read it. Now we are in the secret along with the jokers and we have anticipations of what is coming. When he meets a charming young woman and importantly shows her the letter to the railroad president, we laugh because we know what is in the letter and what is likely to happen. When he swaggers into the outer office and delivers the envelope we get another good laugh. He's getting pretty close to the fun now. In the next scene we see the recipient read the letter and ask that the young man be shown in. We laugh again. In the outer office the boob swaggers through the gate and we laugh some more because we know what is in the letter and can guess the reception that awaits him, and still we laugh when he gets kicked out, because we have the brain-room to laugh, since we do not have to wonder what it is all about.

It is the same way in drama. If we see the hero pass through a street scene there is no effect, but if we know that he is on his way home and that he will find his wife and seventeen small children foully murdered, then this progress toward the tragedy becomes in itself tragic to add to the big effect.

And just a word about hundred-dollar typewriters. We buy new ones because we have to have the type bars changed to suit a special scheme and some of these must be hand cut at the factory, but you can get a "rebuilt" machine for about $35 that will give just as good service and last the beginner just as long as the brand new machine. The only difference is that the rebuilt machine will not have as high a serial number and so will not command as much in an exchange for a new machine, but on the other hand on the first purchase you will have saved more than the exchange value lost. Any rental company will rent you a machine for three months and let the rental apply on the purchase price, and you can get a pretty good line on a machine in three month's use.

No San Francisco Circle.

Some weeks ago Cole Burke applied for and received permission to start an Inquest Circle in Oakland, later moving across the bay to San Francisco. It now develops that Mr. Burke has given the names and addresses of members of both circles to one of those schools—book-revision schemes, the form letters carrying an additional line to the effect that "Our friend, Mr. Cole Burke, of San Francisco, has kindly handed us your name."

We have advised Mr. Burke that this department will have nothing more to do with his schemes, and beg to advise our readers to the same effect, at the same time expressing our regret that the Circle has been used to further the interest of an "Association" that states that "positively no literary skill is required," in writing a photoplay; a statement absolutely at variance with the truth as Mr. Burke probably very well knows.

Wasting Postage.

Not long ago Frank E. Woods, of the Mutual Film Corporation, said that he had received about 7,000 scripts within a period of a few weeks, ten of which were purchased. Some of the others were good, but not what he wanted, very probably, though he said that but ten were good enough to be purchased for reconstruction.

Making a reasonable allowance, we will suppose that a thousand scripts were reasonably good, though not what he wanted. That still leaves six thousand scripts in which no editor would find any merit. It is a modest estimate to figure that each of these scripts required four cents each way, or a total of eight cents per script. This makes a total of $480 in postage utterly and absolutely thrown away in sending scripts to one of the fifteen or twenty possible addresses to which scripts may be sent. Most of these scripts were sent to most of the addresses, but suppost that each of these scripts represented an average of ten calls. There is nearly $5,000 wasted in postage on this batch alone.

We say "wasted" for these scripts never had a chance of a sale. They represent the work of school pupils, of those who never even saw a school sheet, the vast army of those who don't know and do not try to find out. They think it is easy to write plays; they write them and when they get disgusted with the work they drop out, but always with others to take their places. It is a safe estimate that $40,000 yearly are wasted in the efforts of the ignorant to sell scripts that have never a chance of sale, and all because it has been said that anyone can write scripts. Pretty stiff figures, but, if anything, understand.

"Don't add your share to these figures. Don't send out everything you write. Don't send anything out until you have arrived at that point of progress where you are reasonably certain that you are able to meet the best of competition.

Frame This.

A script being read in the studio is worth two in your desk.

Inquiries.

NOTE—No inquiries can be replied to by mail. Look for your answer here. No question can be replied to that necessitates the handling of the manuscript. Always give your name and address. It will not be published. A list of addresses, to which photoplays should be sent, will be supplied on receipt of a STAMPED AND SELF ADDRESSED ENVELOPE. The request should be made to the paper direct and not to this department, nor to the Answers Man.

J. V. W.—The Biograph you mention is old, produced before the agreement on the part of the members of the M. P. P. Co., not to sell prints, but merely to lease them for a certain period. The others are all independent films and are sold outright. All of the subjects you mention are more than eighteen months old, some much older, and are likely to be in very poor shape. If you purchase old subjects you have the right to run them, but they will probably show up very badly on the screen.

BILLY S.—It is a good plan to belong to an Inquest Circle, since an exchange of opinions cannot but be valuable. Criticism is of value only when the critic not only knows what he is talking about, but is able to tell you clearly what his opinion is. We do not believe that any sales bureau is of great value. Edison generally takes several weeks to pass on a promising script, but you have the satisfaction of knowing that the script has been carefully considered.

A. J. D.—As you are a new reader, we would explain that we request that you ask for characters by names, and not by "leads." But for this time, Robert Leonard and Miss Margharita Fischer played leading parts in "Paying the Price," and Miss Furline Lyons and Wallace Reid led in "Who so Digeth a Pit." Shame on you to be so ungallant as to ask a lady's age! We don't.

B. L. D.—The Kay-Bee Identifier cannot place Walter in "Domino's Devotion." Lionel Adams was Leslie Wayne in "Shadows."

G. W. B.—The companies you mention are all "hard markets," buying mostly from a group of approved writers, so a rejection by them is not conclusive, but we do not believe that the subject will appeal to any studio. If you want to preach, turn to the pulpit or the muck-raking magazines, and write photoplay sermons only on direct orders. Put the script in lavender and be more cheerful with your tales.

H. B. H.—Try Kay-Bee, Kalem, Edison, and western Universal. The paper you ask for will be sent you.

ENQUIRER.—We have not the data you require. Sorry.

W. M. Y.—A "Werewolf" is a mythical animal supposed to be inhabited by the spirit of a man, uniting human cunning with brute cruelty. It is a common European superstition and the belief is still held in certain sections. "Clifford reincarnated in the form of Jack Ford," simply means that after the lapse of a hundred years the spirit of Clifford is sent back to earth once more, this time in the earthly form of Jack Ford. If you will add to your definition, "to clothe with flesh," the words the spirit—i. e., "to clothe the spirit with flesh," you'll probably find the idea within your grasp. To drop into slang, it was Clifford's second time on earth.

G. P. V.—Not having seen the release we cannot tell whether or not the leader you mention was necessary or not.

R. B.—Miss Pickford has played with Biograph, Imp and Majestic, as well as the Famous Players. It was during her stay with the Biograph that in default of a regular name, Biograph names then being locked up in a big safe, she was nicknamed "Little Mary."

C. D.—W. Carroll was Timor in "The Conscience of Bassan Bey." Jack Dillon was the grocery man in "The Tender Hearted Boy." Miss Lillian Gish is with Reliance, and very probably her sister is, too, but we are not certain. Dell Henderson directs the Biograph comedies.

RUBENA—Miss Edna Luby was Evelyn in "Shadows." We have not the Victor cast. Thanks for the good wishes.

MRS. G. B. K.—The Vitagraph you saw with Mr. August is an old one.

M. L.—It is probable that your naming the players of the parts resulted in the return of the scripts. The editor or editors probably did not think it worth while to bother with a person who knows no better than to cast the plays. Possibly the belief that you didn't know enough to write a play worth while was heightened by the fact that you seem to have sent your scripts with loose stamps instead of a stamped and addressed return envelope. These little things count and it is argued that if you are so ignorant of customs, you are also not sufficiently practised to be able to write a sufficiently good play to bother about. Ninety-nine times out of a hundred, the theory is proven correct. If you are the exception, change over. You cannot have been writing very long if you do not know the simplest rules of submission. Get a copy of "Technique of the Photoplay," and learn how to do things right. Hardly any editor will bother with a script that shows inexperience, and the experienced author knows that it is not his privilege to cast the plays or suggest the names of any players.

H. O. H.—Miss Louise Glaum was White Dove in "The Efficacy of Prayer."

Question No. 16.

BEST answer will be published, and names of others sending in replies of excellence will appear in the Roll of Honor. Permission to use name must be given or only name of city will be used.

Suppose your manager contemplated the purchase of a generator to be run by engine power, supplying current for his theater. How would you determine the necessary capacity of the generator; what voltage would you recommend it to be and give your reasons, in detail, for recommending that particular voltage? Having determined the wattage capacity of your generator, what relative h. p. should the engine be?

Roll of Honor on Question No. 10.

I have been puzzled this week. There are so many excellent replies to Question No. 10 that I hardly know which to select.

William Stanley James, Camden, New Jersey, sent in a very excellent reply. Also did Brooklyn, New York; John Griffiths, Ansonia, Connecticut; John Stone, Albany, New York; Denver, Colorado; San Francisco and Los Angeles, California; Tracey Hester, Rhinecliff, New York; Harold Weiss, Battle Creek, Michigan, and Ft. Worth, Texas.

After considerable thought I have decided to publish two answers to the above question, one being L. C. La Grow, Albany, N. Y., and one by R. C. Wilson, Winnipeg, Canada. I publish two answers because, while brother La Grow's is best in many ways, friend Wilson's is very plain and easily understood.

Reply to Question No. 10.

By L. C. La Grow, Albany, N. Y.

The question:

What is the difference between the direct current generator commutator and the alternating current commutator? Explain the reasons for the difference.

The answer:

The difference between the collecting rings of an a. c. generator and the commutator of a direct current generator is: in an a. c. machine one end of all the coils of the armature is electrically connected to one collector ring, which is a continuous ring passing entirely around the shaft, insulated therefrom, and is always in electrical connection with one brush, no matter what position of rotation the armature may be in. The other end of all armature coils is connected to another ring, located beside the first one, having its own individual brush.

As will be seen in Fig. 1 the rings deliver to the brushes all current just as it is generated, regardless of the direction of the current, from whence it passes by way of the brushes out to the circuit and around the line through the lamps, motors, etc., to the opposite brush.

Now, in a d. c. generator the commutator consists of two or more segments or bars (usually more than two and ordinarily a great many more than two) laid parallel to the axis of rotation of the armature shaft, insulated from each other and from the shaft. Each one of these bars represents one end of one armature coil, therefore there must, of necessity, be two segments for each armature coil, one representing either end of the coil, and these two bars must be placed 180 degrees apart, or, in other words, opposite each other in the diameter of the commutator. This applies to the theoretic d. c. generator. In practice, however, on many generators each segment represents one coil owing to a peculiarity of the winding. The commutator rectifies the current as follows: Coil one in Fig. 2, is cutting down into the lines of force emanating from pole N, and in so doing generates a positive current, which flows out of segment one and into the brush resting upon it, which delivers it to the outside circuit, at the same time the other end of coil one is passing up across the lines of force of pole S, and is negatively electrified. From the position of the brushes and the connecting of the segments it will be readily seen that each coil will be similarly affected as its commutator segments come to position under the brushes, and that it will be entirely cut out of the outside circuit except when it is in this position. It therefore follows that all the current delivered to the field by the brushes will flow in one direction. Generation should be at its maximum when the coil reaches a position opposite C, but it is not, owing to a distortion of the magnetic field, the lines of force being pulled along to a certain extent by the armature.

You sprung one new one on the editor, and if what you say is true you have not made one point clear. You say that by reason of a peculiarity of the winding of some generators one segment answers for an entire coil. I was not aware of this, and if it is a fact I would like to have a little more detailed explanation of that peculiarity.

Reply to Question No. 10.

By R. C. Wilson, Winnipeg, Canada.

In the first place the device for collecting d. c. from a generator is known as a commutator, whereas the device for collecting a. c. is known as the "collecting rings." The term commutator as applied to an a. c. generator is quite out of order. The commutator is composed of bars of hard drawn copper, insulated from each other by strips of mica. These are known as commutator segments and the thickness of the insulation will be dependent upon the capacity and size of the generator. These segments and their insulation are mounted in circular fashion, the long way of the segment being at right angles to the line of rotation. They are attached to the armature shaft, from which they are heavily insulated. The ends of the armature coils are soldered to the commutator segments and any current generated in the armature is transferred to the circuit through the commutator segments via the brushes. In case of the a. c. generator the current is transferred from the armature coils into collecting rings, which are simply flat faced rings of metal (in the case of large machines this metal is steel), the end of all armature coils being soldered to the rings, one end to one ring and the other end to the other ring. The difference between collecting rings and commutators is as follows: the commutator acts as a rectifier. The current generated in the armature must necessarily be alternating, but when the armature is wound to accommodate a commutator, with the ends of the armature coils connected to diametrically opposite segments of the commutator, the current delivered will be d. c. In the case of the collecting rings they are only a means of taking the current from the revolving armature, without any rectification whatever. An a. c. machine with revolving field coils does not require these rings, the armature in this case being stationary.

(Note). Let it be understood that some of the other replies were equally as correct as these two. There are three things which govern the selection of replies for publication: (a) The number of points covered. (b) The correctness of the reply as a whole. (c) The simplicity and understandableness of the reply. The latter being very important indeed.

Important Notice.

It is impossible to reply to letters through the department in less than two weeks, and sometimes three. Screen Coating.

W. F. Bentley, Middlebury, Vt., asks for the following information:

> Am about to make a new screen and would like your advice concerning the best coating for cloth. Would you prefer alabastine or its equivalent, or the paint you recommend on page 338, second edition of the Handbook?

If you purpose coating a cloth screen I think I would prefer alabastine or its equivalent to the paint. Get a heavy grade of unbleached muslin, or a rather light grade of canvas, as wide as it can be procured. In sewing make the seams as flat as you can. Now stretch it as tightly as you possibly can, and, of course, perfectly smooth; then size with a tolerably strong glue size, allowing it to dry thoroughly, after which coat with alabastine, or its equivalent. When the coating is dry, open the gate of your machine, project the light to your screen, and, with a straight edge, using a heavy carpenter's pencil, make lines, from one to two inches inside edges of the light, on the screen, rounding the corners the same as the corners of the light. Next shut off the light and paint the outer edge of the screen, right up to the lines you have made, with lampblack mixed with turpentine and just barely enough oil to prevent it from rubbing off—say one-third of a pint of boiled linseed oil to two-thirds of a pint of turpentine. This black border will add considerably to the brilliancy of the picture. See "The Screen" in the Handbook.

Apprentices.

Joplin, Missouri, makes inquiry as follows:

> Why has the union stopped taking apprentices? I have been trying to get into a union operating room for a year, but without success. Though I am only 16 years old I see no reason why I should not make a good union operator, as I have been studying very hard.

Very likely when you have reached the proper age the union will give you a chance. I don't know how it is in Joplin, but here in New York it would be against the law to employ you in any capacity, at anything. A 16-year-old boy ought to be in school. However, it is true that thousands of them are compelled to earn their daily bread—a rather sad commentary on our much boasted civilization. As a matter of fact the editor of this department began to earn his own living when he was 14, and he found it pretty reasonably tough grubbing for a time too. You should not think of entering an operating room before you are 18, at the very least, nor could I conscientiously advise the Joplin union to accept you as an apprentice until you are that age. I know how you, and thousands of other boys, look at this matter, but that does not alter the fact that there are many reasons, which an older man can plainly see, why boys of 16, or, if it suits you better, young men of 16, have no business in the operating room of a theater. Of course, I grant you there is the occasional exception. We have 16-year-old boys and girls who are accomplished piano players—who are on the concert stage even. I once knew a 16-year-old boy who built a complete 110 volt, 15 ampere dynamo which worked fine, and then he turned around and built a motor to run his dynamo, and it was an economical motor too. But that boy was in the nature of a freak, as are also the child musicians. They are the exceptions which prove the rule. The I. A. T. S. E. has not ceased, except in local instances, taking apprentices, but, as a matter of fact, the I. A. T. S. E. has a large number of members who have charge of operating rooms, but who themselves ought to serve an apprenticeship, and there are thousands of other operators outside of the I. A. T. S. E. who ought to serve an apprenticeship, and to a man up a stump it would seem as though we might better fill up the apprenticeship jobs from that kind of material, for a little while at least. Now, Joplin, I have not consumed all this space for your particular individual benefit, but for the benefit of you and many others who write this office continually asking questions similar to yours. During the past week alone I have pitched into the waste basket more than twenty-five letters from men asking how they should proceed to become moving picture operators, and some weeks these waste basket contributions run very much higher than that. It is purely a waste of postage and energy to write asking that particular question. There is but one answer, viz: serve an apprenticeship of not less than one year, and two is better.

Machine Trouble.

Troy, N. Y., writes.

> Will you please tell me how to stop some of the noise in my Power's Six A? It is a new machine and has only been running about eight months. It runs fine without a film, but with a film in it is heard all over the house.

The trouble most likely lies in your apron rollers. Probably they are too close together. Remove the apron, 669, Fig. 115, page 272 of the Handbook, and spread the rollers a scant 1/16 of an inch further apart. If this does not stop the noise then bend the apron rollers farther back, so that the front of the hub of the roller is about opposite, or in line with, the track on the apron.

Question Answered.

Several who have remitted 25 cents for the questions have asked whether or not the answers would be compiled in the same way. In reply I would say that they will not. I am sending the questions, as soon as they are ready, to all those remitting the sum of 25 cents to cover the cost. That is to enable operators to get busy and study. The answers, however, will not be sent out. You will have to wait for that. To send out the answers would simply form a glossary and defeat the very purpose I am aiming at, viz: to induce operators to study. I figure that inasmuch as there is several weeks intervening between the publication of the question and its answer, very few will wait for the answer, but will get busy and learn it for themselves, and those who do wait for the answer—why it won't do them any good. They will simply have learned something by heart and you cannot apply knowledge attained by that kind of a short cut. It is of little or no use to you.

Managers' Notice.

A short time ago mention was made in the department concerning the right of patrons to kick about the projection when it is not up to the mark. Mention also was made of the feasibility of the use of a slide, and it is on that subject that I now wish to enlarge a little. I would suggest to the managers of houses where the projection is high class, that they have a slide made reading somewhat as follows:

> Patrons will confer a favor if they will inform the management of any fault in the projection, such as discoloration of the light, running the films too fast or too slow, or any other faults they may observe.

The wording of the foregoing slide is only suggestive, the idea being to get the audience into a critical state of mind. Now, do you see the point? You already have good projection. But perhaps your competitor has poor projection. This slide will induce your patrons to watch for faults; they won't find them in your house, at least not many of them, but they will find them in the projection of your competitor, and the ultimate result will be the education of the public, along the very lines you want them educated, to discern faults in projection. This inversely will lead them to patronize the house in which good projection prevails. You will be the gainer. It will also have the effect of forcing the "other fellow" to improve and come up to your class, or at least try to. The idea seems to me to be a good one, though it probably won't be very popular with the operator.

Pointed Solid Carbons.

Several correspondents have asked why it is that half-inch solid carbons are not pointed the same as the cored carbons. I have taken the matter up with Hugo Reisinger, the importer of one brand of carbons, and this is his reply:

> In explanation of the lack of pointing I would say that the carbons these operators are getting are probably the Electra Blue Label carbons, which are secured through electrical jobbers, and are not pointed, but blunt at both ends. These carbons really are intended for use in enclosed, long-burning arc lamps. I would, therefore, suggest that you advise operators when they order half-inch solid carbons of the Electra brand to be sure they are pink label and not blue label. Pink label half-inch solid carbons are all pointed on one end, and the twelve inch carbons are pointed on both ends. There is no reason why a mistake of this kind should be made since "Electra" carbons designed for projection purposes bear the trademark, "Pink Label Electra," and both ends of the package bear another pink label designating the particular use for the carbons.

For which information we thank friend Reisinger. It is things of this kind that are of practical value.

The Charles L. Kiewert Company, distributors of the Bio carbons, reply as follows concerning this proposition:

> With reference to yours of the 23rd, we beg to advise that all solid Bio carbons, as well as cored, of all diameters, are pointed before leaving our factory. The manufacturers of the Bio carbons bear in mind at all times the convenience of the operator, and it is for this reason the rule of pointing all carbons has been strictly followed. Our 12 inch carbons are all pointed on both ends.

Screen Size.

K. F. Van Norman, Mansfield, Pa., asks:

> How large a screen and what size picture would give the best results, with a 70 foot throw, using a Power's Six machine? Also what preparation would you recommend for coating a screen? Are the so-called aluminum and silver screens giving good results? My theater is 85 feet long. Am using a 10 by 12 screen. Would I get better results with a shorter throw?

A 70 foot throw is just a nice distance to project a 12 foot picture. It is as good or better than anything shorter. You have not said how wide your theater is, but, personally, I believe your 12 foot picture is just a nice size. If you increase the size of the picture you will very rapidly decrease its brilliancy, unless you use increased amperage. See page 342 of the Handbook. The mirror screen, the mirroroide screen, the gold fibre screen, and others of that class, are efficient. The mirror screen is costly, but is practically indestructible; the mirroroide and gold fibre screens are warranted for a period of five years. Home made aluminum surfaces cannot be recommended. What is perhaps the best coating for a home made screen, everything considered, is white alabastine, or its equivalent, to be had from any paint store. See reply to W. B. Bentley.

Doesn't Know It All.

G. R. Cameron, Tacoma, Wash., says:

> Enclosed find 25 cents for the list of questions. If you decide you cannot put them out, just buy a good cigar on me with the two bits. Don't think because I am not attempting to answer the questions that I am not deeply interested, and decidedly grateful for the chance of such enlightenment. I have been in the show business nearly seventeen years, and the longer I am in it the more I find myself unable to give what I term "good" answers to such questions as you are asking. Only yesterday I had an "advanced usher" (new manager) ask me if I knew all about a rectifier. I said no, and the longer I use one the more I find I do not know.

Yes, brother Cameron, the questions I am asking are not kindergarten ones, and are not designed to be. At least four out of five of those who send in really good answers will have to study, and some of them will have to study good and hard too, and that is just what I am aiming at. As to the rectifier, you will find very complete information on that animal, accompanied by comprehensive illustrations, on pages 171 to 182, inclusive, of the Handbook. That matter alone is worth the entire price of the book to users of mercury arc rectifiers.

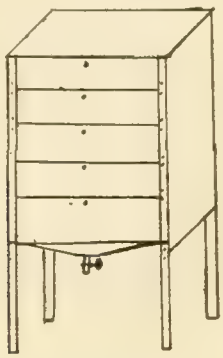
Mr. Earl E. Richardson, Barry, Ill., submits description and sketch of a film cabinet of which he is presumably the inventor.

> This film cabinet is to be made of galvanized iron riveted on inch angle irons. The shelf spaces will be 4 inches, with a 12 inch space below for emergency reels. The doors fasten on either side with spring hinges, with porcelain knobs in center to open door. Bottom of cabinet is cup-shaped to retain water, with water valve on under side. Shelves will be perforated so moisture can reach the top. The cabinet can be lined with asbestos and can be made in any size. Shelves will be 4 inches deep by 14 square.



Provided this cabinet be mechanically well constructed it seems to fill the bill all right. The only objection I see is that the perforation of the shelves would, to all intents and purposes, place the film all in one receptacle, so that if one caught fire the whole business would go. It occurs to me that this could be obviated by a small pipe running from the water reservoir to each receptacle. This would carry sufficient moisture, and still allow of the films being segregated from each other by a fireproof partition. I would also remark that a division between the films ought also to be lined with asbestos not less than one-fourth of an inch in thickness.

Measuring Film.

H. W. Griggs, Wisconsin, submits the following interesting diagram and matter:

> As a means of readily knowing the amount of film on a reel, I herewith append a table and various arcs showing the radial distance for each 100 feet, with diameter and inverse distance, or distance from the 10 inch circle to each 100 feet.
> It will be seen that a 10 inch reel carrying 500 feet of film is only 1¾ inches from the 10 inch circle, which most anyone probably knows, though it would hardly be believed, just the same. If a 10 inch reel with a 1¾ inch hub holds 1,000 feet of film, then each square inch of area contains 13.2 feet of film 1/160 inch in thickness, and this is very close to what the average film runs, > by actual measurement, as based on the quantity lightly packed together, the reel making 620 revolutions. Thin film averages 1/180 inch in thickness, which allows 1,135 feet to a full reel. Again, the average film will wind up closely 1/150 of an inch in thickness, filling a reel at 950 feet with 620 turns of the reel. This may come in handy for some of the boys, and if you have no room for the letter perhaps you can at least use the diagram.

Well, brother Griggs, I don't know as to the actual practical value of this matter, except in a rather rough way, but anyhow it is interesting, and therefore I have given it space. I did not have time to check up your measurements, but will leave that to the department fans. What I assume you have reference to is not the actual thickness of the film itself, but to the amount of space each thickness of film ordinarily occupies in a reel.

Knowledge Is Power.

New York City remits 25 cents for the questions and says:

> No value can be placed on the knowledge you are giving us. In such education as you are supplying lies the salvation of the whole scheme of affairs, from the producer up, for it lies largely in the hands of the moving picture operator to make or break the whole business, and I am inclined to think that this fact will be brought very pointedly to the minds of many 'ere the work is well under way.

I presume the brother means that these questions are going to show a good many people how little they really do know about the technical end of their profession, and if he could see what I see, and read the answers I read, he would be more than ever convinced of the correctness of his position. The questions will be compiled and sent out about the middle of January. There will probably be at least 150 and maybe 200 of them so that the series will last from two to three years.

He Misunderstands.

C. L. Dowsley, Winnipeg, Manitoba, Canada, writes:

> Regarding my reply to Question No. 5, you say the voltage of a shunt wound dynamo would be at zero until there was some demand for it; that is to say, a shunt wound dynamo running at full speed, and with an open circuit (no load), would not generate voltage. What is there to stop it from generating full voltage, even if there is no load? The field coils are not connected in series with the load like those of a series wound machine. There is such high resistance in the human body that a person can bridge a 110 volt or 220 volt line without making the least difference in the pull or load on the line. Now, if this is the case, why is it that upon bridging the line of a 110 volt shunt wound dynamo, carrying no load, that you get a shock, and upon bridging the same line with a voltmeter it reads full voltage; that is providing the dynamo is running at full speed. If you bridge the line of a series wound machine which is carrying no load with a voltmeter, it will still read zero, because the amperage flowing through the voltmeter does not make enough difference to cause a rise in voltage. If your shunt wound dynamo were running up to speed your voltage would be at its highest point with no load, so that my characteristic curve was O. K. Regarding brother Johnston's plan for compounding a shunt wound dynamo: well perhaps it would not be possible on all machines, but it certainly would be practicable. It all depends upon whether you have enough room to make the series windings, and enough of them, for a small dynamo would require more series turns to compound it than would a large one. If you could get your dynamo wound as brother Johnston suggests, and with the right number of ampere turns in the series winding (Aha! Diskivered!—Ed.) there is no reason why it would not be as efficient as any compound wound machine of the same capacity, although it would not look as neat. If any of the Californian or other Southern operators find the winter too severe they should pay a visit to "The Peg." We do things in style up here, and, though it is only six days before Christmas, and we are a lot nearer to the North Pole than you are, it is so hot we still have to sprinkle the streets to keep down the dust. Now, of course, I don't mean by this that there is to be a stampede to Winnipeg by a bunch of operators who have cold feet.

I am not going to get into any argument with you on the matter of the generation of voltage, but neither you nor any other man can prove, except by deduction, that a shunt wound dynamo produces anything until there is current flow. However, I am willing to concede that you are probably correct. I cannot say now, but I think I misread or misunderstood what you said, although it seems to be perfectly plain; but I know when I dictated that "I don't think so" I had something else in mind, other than the generator not having full voltage. As to brother Johnston's compounding, you pointed out a defect in that proposition yourself. No one but an expert electrician and one thoroughly versed in dynamo construction would know exactly how many ampere turns to use, and that is mostly what I had in mind. However, I said I did not think that kind of a machine would be efficient, and by that same token I don't think so yet, although I admit I may be wrong in this. I am simply basing that idea on the fact that a machine originally designed for a shunt wound, or separate shunt non self-exciting, is designed primarily for that particular kind of a proposition, and I should suppose would be less efficient than a machine originally designed for compounding. I am not willing to swear to that proposition, but it sounds like horse sense to me. Remember I am not an expert in dynamo designing or construction. In some of these things I make comment without really being sure of my ground, for I would just as soon stir up discussion as not.

From Canada.

G. W. Joudry, Rosthern, Saskatchewan, Canada, writes:

> Enclosed find 25 cents for those questions. I have the only electric plant in town. It consists of a 7½ k. w., Fairbanks-Morse generator, pulled by a 9 h.p. engine. Both are working fine. I am very anxious to see those questions come out, as in this small town I am, of necessity, operator and engineer. In fact everything in this little business is run by my family. I have a Wurlitzer player piano which supplies music, and you will see it is very important that I, and such as I, get all the information possible. I have upward of $10,000 invested in this business and have got to pull it through, and naturally in a town where there is no electric light, and no electricians, I am up against a tough proposition. And now you start out on the very thing I need, viz: knowledge of the generator. You, therefore see how important this matter is to me, and probably to lots of others in the same box. Of course, operators in cities don't care. They get from $20 to $35 per week and don't care whether school keeps or not. (That is so near the truth that it is going to bump the corns of quite a number of city men.—Ed.). When anything goes wrong they send out and get an electrician and have it fixed, or at least they have many avenues of information and knowledge; when anything goes wrong here it's up to "Willie"—and I am Willie.

Yes, brother Joudry, I can thoroughly appreciate your position, and it is the position of literally thousands of men in other small towns. Yet there are men in the cities who are so unutterably selfish that they would shut you people off from all avenues of knowledge if they could, and would limit the amusement of millions of people who live in small towns, in order that they themselves be enabled to maintain a sort of monopoly on projection knowledge, and the pitiful part of it is that nine out of ten of them have no more knowledge than the law allows, while fully five out of every ten have not got as much knowledge as the law demands, as is evidenced by the result on their screens. The projection department is here to help you, and to help them, even though it helps them against their will, and as I have said before some day they will realize the utter foolishness of their position. A goodly number of them are beginning to realize it already, which is to their credit, and altogether to the discredit of those who have not as yet progressed that far.

Many Thanks St. Louis.

Joe Hayes, St. Louis, Mo., arises to make the following remarks:

> On page 1006, November 29 issue, Appleton, Wis., made the following statement: "I have charged storage cells from a 20 light constant a. c. generator of 9.6 ampere capacity, with the 20 lamps in series with the battery." Now you have charged us not to let anyone slip it over on us, therefore allow me to say that if Appleton can charge a storage cell with alternating current, he is some wonder. What he possibly has is a 1,000 volt constant current arc generator of 9.6 ampere capacity used for series arc lamp lighting—d. c. not a. c. In charging he has his battery in series with the 20 arc lamps, so that "giving it 1,000 volts" is not so much after all, since the battery only gets what is left of the 1,000 volts after it has gone through 20 arc lamps. It is possible to charge a battery thus, but it is not the best way.

There, the feline has escaped from the all-enveloping sack. I knew somebody had slipped something over somewhere, for several writers have mentioned that storage-battery charging on a. c. matter, but I did not know where it came in. I did not notice at the time that Appleton stated he had charged with a. c. That, of course, is impossible, but it seems I let him "slip it over" all right, so the joke is on me. The solution brother Hayes advances is doubtless the correct one.

Frozen Vaseline.

Wyoming writes:

> Am showing here three times a week. Have Motiograph machine, Model 1911. About three weeks ago it began to get cold and at the same time the machine began to run hard. I traced the trouble to the geneva movement, which is in perfect adjustment, therefore I attributed it to the lubrication. The last time I put in vaseline I could not obtain the white kind, so used Blue Seal vaseline, and I believe I put in a trifle too much, and that excess, together with the freezing weather, has caused the trouble. Can you suggest a way of thawing it without taking the movement apart?

If your oil well is full you will have to take it apart and remove some of the vaseline, if not, you can probably overcome the difficulty by injecting a little kerosene.

A Few Questions.

K. F. Van Norman, Mansfield, Pa., orders a Handbook and asks the following questions:

> What size condensers should I use for a ten-foot picture at 70 feet? What would give the best results in the carbon line; a solid ½ below and a cored ⅝ above? Also is it wise to use these carbons on a. c.? Have had a lot of trouble with cable burning off inside of lamp house. Lugs don't seem to help any. What would you suggest? Am using 110 volt a. c. What should be the size of the screen for a 12-foot picture at 70 feet?

Two 7½ condensers ought to fill the bill. As to the carbons, you cannot use solid carbons either above or below with a. c. See pages 202 to 212 inclusive of the Handbook for full information. As to the cables burning off, possibly the contacts (where they join the lamp) are not clean, also very likely the ventilation at the top of your lamp house is stopped up, thus creating excessive heat inside the lamp house. See the "Lamp House," page 197 of the Handbook. If you are using 60 amperes a. c. I would recommend that you follow the instructions on page 200 of the Handbook. As to your question concerning the screen: I don't know just what you mean. If your picture is 12 feet wide it will be ¾ of that height or 9 x 12.

Wrong Condensers.

Le Roy Hester, Purdon, Tex., writes:

> Have carefully read the Handbook from page 197 to 213 and think I have every thing according to instructions. Have my own 110 volt d. c. plant and have always had a fine light until recently. Am using two coils of resistance about like those shown on page 113, Fig. 47. Use ⅝ cored carbons above and a ½ inch solid below. I get a fine light at the stereopticon, but when I pull over to M. P. there is a blue center and a clear border or a red border and a clear center. Moving the lamp house backward and forward does no good. My throw is 38 feet; machine, Exhibition Model Edison; carbons are set as per Figs. 100 and 101 of the Handbook.

You cover everything but one point, but that unfortunately is an exceedingly important one, viz: the width of your picture. However, your throw is only 38 feet and it's pretty near a cinch that your condensers are of too long focal length. But you cannot expect to get a very good picture of greater width than 10 feet with a 38 foot throw. I think you will find that two 6½ condensers will clear up your moving picture field, though it may raise thunder with your stereopticon. I cannot help you definitely without knowing the width of both the stereopticon and motion picture. I would refer you to the last paragraph on page 363 of the Handbook for further information.

Not Desirable.

J. R. Shackelford, Louise, Miss., submits sketch of a scheme to rewind with the projector. In effect his plan is to place another magazine at the end of the regular lower magazine and make the lower magazine of double thickness, so that it will hold two reels. When the first reel is rewound into the lower magazine it is shoved over and the film is threaded into the second magazine, which contains the empty reel. Another empty reel is, of course, placed on the spindle beside the full one to take up the next reel.

Such a scheme, while it does credit to friend Shackelford's ingenuity, is undesirable for several reasons, not the least of which would be the additional power required to run the machine, the complications added thereto, such as making patches, and the time it would take to thread the rewinder part of it. I am sorry, brother Shackelford, but I could not recommend that particular proposition.

Who is Guilty?

W. C. Evans, Cushing, Okla., submits a sample of damaged film and writes:

> Just a few words through the department regarding some operator in this section of the brush. I am handing you a sample of film clipped from a comparatively new reel. You can judge for yourself what ought to be done to the operator who is butchering films in this manner. We are running Universal service and the reels are on a circuit, so that I cannot very well locate the guilty party, but it is only on Mondays that the film is in this condition, and it is on Mondays only that our films are received from Bartlesville, Okla. They come from Cleveland O. K., but don't know where Cleveland gets them from, therefore could not say who is guilty. I now have three reels practically gone to the bad. Please state your opinions, understanding that it is not just a few feet of these reels which are in this condition, but the damage runs through the entire length.

Well, Cushing, it seems to me the matter is up to the film exchange, and I cannot understand an exchange standing for any such condition as you describe. The two feet of film submitted has the sprocket holes ripped off of nearly the whole of one side, and, while I could not say positively, it looks as though a tension spring was at fault; either a deposit of emulsion, or a defective spring. I base this opinion on the fact that, while the other side of the film is perfect and the sprocket holes show no marks, there is a very distinct line of scratches down the holes on the left side, that is, where any of them are left. It would hardly be worth while expressing my opinion on a matter of this kind, but it is to be hoped that through this publication the guilty one will be discovered and his film service cut off. That circuit business is a bad idea anyhow. It is an attempt to get too much work out of the films at the expense of poor service.

Power's Five Inside Shutter.

L. T. Hill, Mystic, Conn., writes:

> I am about to install an outside shutter on a Power's Five. Would the two-blade shutter of the Power's Six work successfully on the No. Five, and give less flicker than the inside shutter? If not, could you give me the proper dimensions for an outside shutter for the Power's No. Five? I have both of your Handbooks and I also have the little one which the N. Power Company gave away several years ago. If those objecting to the questions and answers worked in small towns, as so many of us do, where you cannot consult electrical works, and have the benefit of mutual help, I think they would keep still, or else climb over the other side of the fence in a hurry.

In the first place I would advise the purchase of an up-to-date projector rather than the installation of an outside shutter on the Power's Five. However, fairly good results have been had with home-made installations of that kind, several of which were illustrated in the department. You will find one on page 965, March 16, 1912, issue; one on page 809 of the October 8, 1910, issue, and on page 710, April 1, 1911, issue. All these are illustrated by photographs and described. The last named was by Mr. Charles H. Addams, moving picture operator, Rockford, Ill. Possibly if you address him, he could give you the dimensions of his shutter, provided he is still there. Anyone having such an installation will please send the shutter dimensions to Mr. L. T. Hill, 22 Bank Street, Mystic, Conn. I would suggest a three-wing shutter, however, if you are using d. c.

New Haven Operators Wined and Dined.

Sunday, December 28, Mr. Chas. E. Schneider gave a smoke-talk to the operators of Local 273, at New Haven, in their social rooms. Refreshments and cigars were abundant, followed by a short talk by Brother Schneider. Messrs. Smith and Bohanan, of the Nicholas Power Company, were present as guests, as were also Mr. Webber and Mr. Clark, president and secretary of the Springfield Local 186.

Don't Forget the Operators' Ball.

At Manhattan Casino, Saturday evening, January 24th. A splendid time for everyone. The password now is "Meet me at the Operators' Ball."

Another Slide Coating.

D. E. Knorr, Allentown, Pa., suggests Bon Ami and Letterine as a slide coating which will do the trick. "Mix to suit," he says, "cover with colored gelatine, if you like colors. It is economical, quick and clean." Brother Knorr's directions are not very elaborate, nor does he explain what letterine is; the Bon Ami part of it has been published in the department before.

Operators Are you perfectly satisfied with the results you get on the screen?

"THE SQUIRE'S MISTAKE" (Lubin), January 6.—There are good situations in this story, although there are times when the acting seems a bit affected. One of the best situations is where the escaped convict enters the home of Squire Ruggles. It was hardly convincing, however, to permit the wounded man to lie on the center table writhing in pain alongside of a lamp which had been shown to be lighted. Henry Stanley as Squire Ruggles and Raymond Gallagher as his son do good work.

"ON THE GREAT STEEL BEAM" (Edison), January 6.—Good drama. The development seemed to drag a bit, but the story held after the first 300 feet. There was good comedy in the homecoming of the new foreman as he told his little family of his promotion. Harry Gripp, as the foreman, gave a natural portrayal. His demonstration, also, as to how to handle men was true to life. The quarrel between the discharged foreman, played by Barry O'Moore, and the new incumbent, was well done. There is a rescue that will thrill. The Rev. Sydney Booth is the author of an interesting script and Ashley Miller is the director.

"HEARTS AND FLOWERS" (Essanay), January 6.—This is a beautiful picture. Francis X. Bushman has the lead, supported by Ruth Stonehouse. Likewise is there a child, who does good work. The leading characters give a fine performance, sympathetic, tender. There is a steady pull throughout the whole reel. The acting and staging are of the best. There is an unusually pretty and effective finish.

"THE LIVING WAGE" (Selig), January 6.—In this story a well-to-do young woman, her interests aroused at a hearing of the Living Wage Commission, obtains employment in a factory, the proprietor of which has sworn that his earnings are only 7 per cent. on his investment. She raises a false alarm of fire, and in the confusion secures possession of a certain book of the firm, which shows the earnings are much larger and that the proprietor has committed perjury. This she carries to the commission. In other words, she steals the book—does evil that good may come of it. The story will interest.

"WHOM GOD HATH JOINED" (Patheplay), January 6.—There is at the end of this picture a melodramatic rescue of a man wrongly accused of murder. The rope is already about his neck. His wife, whom he had refused to acknowledge, is the one who saves him. The action is responsible for the man's reformation; he becomes a different citizen, writing his parents that he possesses a wife and child, and settling down. Fair Western.

"A FOOT OF ROMANCE" (Essanay), January 7.—A mistake in the cutting and joining department of the Essanay Company made the best situation found in this picture—it mixed those letters up just at a time when it was very funny to have them mixed. Of course the action went on without this added bit of satire that would have helped it. As it is, the burlesque-farce offering, played in the comical way that Wallace Beery has at command and with the sprightliness of Beverly Bayne, amuses.

"BY UNSEEN HAND" (Selig), January 7.—By picturing a motive for murder and then making the man who is to be suspected act suspiciously until we, the audience, think that he really did kill the man from a great distance, Producer William Duncan has made a good offering. The burden of the story is the proving the man guiltless. Its only noticeable weakness is the fact that the dead man is only sleeping at first, yet makes us think him dead. It is not until we see the man again that we discover the wound mark, yet one cannot be sure it wasn't there from the first. Hardee Kirkland is the author.

"DISHING DICK'S DISHWATER" (Patheplay), January 7.—A cleverly thought-up comic that is fresh and quite laughable. It will amuse all kinds of people and can be shown anywhere.

"SNOW EFFECTS IN AUSTRIA" (Patheplay), January 7.—On the same reel are some lovely views of snowy forests and mountains. The photography is excellent and the scenes well chosen.

"DIANA'S DRESS REFORM" (Vitagraph), January 7.—A farce in which the humor is rather rudimentry. Surely there is nothing in it that the dullest won't fully understand, as much as the quickest. A very fair, intelligent Broadway audience gave no laughter that we heard. Dean Willets is author and the producer is Ralph Ince.

"AFRICAN SEA BIRDS" (Edison), January 7.—Wonderful photography makes this an exceptional picture of the sea and of birds of the larger kind that live along its rocky shores. It is like seeing them through a fine glass.

"THE SHERLOCK HOLMES GIRL" (Edison), January 7.—Not very much can be said for this offering by Miss Bliss Milford. She, herself, as the hobbledehoy serving maid in the hotel, gives a conventional burlesque characterization and there is nothing new in the business. It is of the slightest texture. The piece was produced by Charles H. France.

"THEIR INTEREST IN COMMON" (Vitagraph), January 8.—A rather naively conceived story of lovers who think they have nothing in common until they find that both are lovers of children. The climax finds both at a baby show and the situation is reinforced by a third character, who doesn't like babies. Rosalie S. Jacoby is the author, R. S. Sturgeon the producer.

"MONTANA STATE FAIR" (Vitagraph), January 8.—On the same reel and a good filler.

"HIS FATHER'S HOUSE" (Biograph), January 8.—This picture will surely please servant girls and their friends, not because it takes up their particular trials or tells any truthful story about them, but because it is a "pipe dream" that is designed to fit in with them. It is a melodrama of the most improbable sort and will or may furnish amusement as "unconscious comedy" to spectators who know something about life as it is. The acting is not of a high order; but the staging is of the best. It is clearly photographed.

"THE HILLS OF PEACE" (Essanay), January 8.—A story of the West; but full of that humanity that is of no locality or place. Carl Stockdale, as the prospector and partner of the dead brother of the girl, makes it very effective and emotional by his finely accurate and restrained acting. The girl is weak in this role and is not convincing. As a whole, the picture makes a very good offering and will be liked.

"THE SOMNAMBULIST" (Melies), January 8.—A picture made in a land where palms are plentiful, but telling a story such as we often see in French pictures.. It deals with a poacher's revenge, the sleep-walking of a bereaved mother and her husband's not very commendable jealousy, caused by a letter from the poacher, which is very unconvincing. The picture has some very lovely scenes, though the early scenes are not clearly printed; they are thick. As a whole, it makes a fairly entertaining offering; it will get by with better pictures.

"PIETRO THE PIANIST" (Selig), January 8.—Hardly any plot at all, and full of padding, it has much that is laughable. There were a few in the audience who laughed nearly all the way through it and it seemed that the majority were interested in it. Pietro is a "case" of temperament. He is always the same and a good deal of his temperament is shown. There is a comical gutter band and some hand organ men.

"A RAMBLE IN PONDICHERRY, INDIA" (Patheplay), January 8.—On the last reel with the feature of this date, this interesting hand-colored film is acceptable. It is nearly 500 feet, perhaps.

"THE JOKE ON JANE" (Kalem), January 9.—In which John E. Brennan appears as a henpecked husband. The plot is original and full of the best humor, but the climax should have come sooner. While this ends tamely it is far above the average half reel in conception.

"MAKING CUT GLASS" (Kalem), January 9.—A very interesting and instructive series of pictures, showing the manner in which cut glass is made. This answers the question most people ask when they look at a piece of cut glass—how is it done? This, with above, makes a very good release.

"THE ENGINEER'S REVENGE" (Lubin), January 9.—This film story is sufficiently stirring and is well acted throughout by a cast including John Smiley, Justine Huff, Joseph Smiley and Clarence Elmer. The fiendishness of the engineer's attempted crime makes the subsequent reconciliation seem impossible. In this respect the plot is overdrawn, but there is much about the story that is interesting and commendable.

"BUNNY'S MISTAKE" (Vitagraph), January 9.—Bunny is never more amusing than when he is doleful and here he is in a sad way indeed, for he thinks he has run over a child in his car. It turns out to be a big doll. Doris M. Schroeder wrote the scenario. The incidental business is all good and particularly the sub-title "The wicked flee when no man pursueth." A good comedy number.

"ON THE BREAST OF THE TIDE" (Selig), January 9.—The story of a sailor's regeneration, after being sent from home by his wife and told never to return. In a later scene he rescues his own child from drowning. This is simple in its elements, convincingly pictured and makes quite a strong appeal.

"THE LONELY ROAD" (Edison), January 10.—A film story written by Y. Spinner, covering several large lapses of time. Mary Fuller and Gertrude McCoy appear as two sisters. Margaret supports the other after her husband's death, giving up her own love. In after years the lover, portrayed by Charles Ogle, thinks of her. He finds the widowed sister and together they search for Margaret, who is dead when they locate her. The story has a slow, natural development and works convincingly up to its pitifully tragic close.

"THE BARTERED CROWN" (Biograph), January 10.—The plot of this is quite novel, but it does not make a very strong story. The young man buys the orphan girl's hair and holds over her constantly the threat of cutting it off. His intentions are uncertain till toward the end, when he asks her to marry him. The photography is good and the most is made of a slight idea.

"WHEN THE DOCTORS FAILED" (Lubin), January 10.—This half-reel shows the means employed by a young husband who wants to have his friends in for a game of poker. He pretends to be shot and they in turn pretend to be doctors. This is entirely farcical and has some amusing spots in it.

"MARRIED MEN" (Lubin), January 10.—An eccentric comedy, in which the henpecked Irishman revolts. The chase scene works up some amusement of the slap-stick type.

"TELL-TALE STAINS" (Kalem), January 10.—There are some very attractive and well-staged scenes in this, including the chief one showing the masquerade ball. But the plot itself has a conventional and "made up" effect in its impression on the observer; hence, the lack of suspense. One of the most interesting moments was when the girl recognized her dancing partner as the crook by the cigarette stains on his fingers.

"SNAKEVILLE'S NEW DOCTOR" (Essanay), January 10.—In this characteristic Western number Marguerite Clayton appears as a young lady doctor, pursued by male patients with all sorts of assumed ailments. Some of the situations are amusing and, of course, in the end Broncho Billy marries her. The plot is not overly strong even for light comedy.

"CONCENTRATION" (Biograph), January 12.—There have been a good many pictures dealing with inventions, yet they seem to go with the public with whom an invention stands (happily for the script writer) for success. This story, with Claire McDowell in a leading role and well supported, will be liked. It has a touch of the quality that passes for depth; is clear and romantic enough and has suspense, mostly due to the skill of the players in simulating concern as to the outcome of the developing situation.

"TOBACCO INDUSTRY" (Lubin), January 12.—A clear and interesting picture taken in Cuba, perhaps. This industry has been shown in pictures more instructive, but makes a worthy offering.

"SMILES OF FORTUNE" (Lubin), January 12.—An acceptable little farce, freshly conceived and with a situation that one can sympathize with. It was written by Emmett Campbell Hall and produced by Arthur Hotaling. The hero had bought a "success smile" at the beauty parlors and it can't come off, so it gets him into trouble with his cranky old relative who has money to leave, but his sweetheart also is a relative and to her the rich uncle really gives the money, so it becomes a smile of fortune. The audience seemed to be amused and there was a fair measure of laughter.

"PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 4" (January 12).—The high waves along the Jersey coast and several other items of more than usual interest make this an exceptional offering.

"THE RIGHT AND THE WRONG OF IT" (Vitagraph), January 12.—There is a very commendable attempt in this picture to criticize a tendency of modern life and it does succeed in stating human experience in dramatic terms. Yet there is a feeling that it lacks authority; we are willing to believe it in general without being compelled to believe it in particular. That going back to work of the business-woman-wife hardly happened quite that way—that part ought to have been developed; she should have been tempted by some sort of offer. The script is by B. C. Flanders and was produced by Ralph Ince.

Licensed Specials

"THE SMUGGLER'S SON" (Cines), January 6.—These two reels are well photographed and well played. It is possible the acting department would have been benefited had the two women changed parts. The second lead, who had little to do, possessed the magnetism the leading woman lacked. The story held all the way; in some respects it had novelty.

"JERRY'S UNCLE'S NAMESAKE" (Vitagraph), January 6.—There is continual laughter in these two reels. The parts are played by the best that could have been selected—or surely none better could have been found. The fun comes from the story as well as in the excellent acting. The author is announced as Mrs. Russell. Sidney Drew is Jerry, and Louise Beaudet is Mrs. Jerry. These form one team of the combination. Then there are William Shea and Kate Price for another. Rogers Lytton, the uncle of Jerry, by his make-up kept the reviewer puzzled for some time as to his identity. He, too, contributed his share of the funmaking Ethel Lloyd, the maid, made much of her part. Mr. Drew and James Young were the directors, and they put over a story that will rank well up with the Vitagraph's best two-reel comedies.

"HER HUSBAND'S FRIEND" (Kalem), January 7.—Beautifully staged and perfectly photographed and with many pretty light effects this two-part offering entertains the eye. Its story is a melodrama built after a well-known type and with freshness of incident, due mostly to arrangement of the business, rather than to anything really new, yet it never fails to keep going a thread of interest. Mrs. Alice Hollister, who plays the weak-willed heroine, appears in a number of pretty dresses that come out extremely well in the print. Such things are of no great value to the picture however much they may please uninstructed simple minds. That they please is true. Then there are some fine scenes. The acting was not good enough to put real life in the corpse of this old story, but was good, intelligent work.

"THE WARDS OF SOCIETY" (Patheplay), January 8.—A tremendous picture, truthful and instructive, but at the same time one that has a quality far beyond all kinds of ordinary instruction. It is of tremendous importance to the public, and what is more the public will be very quick to recognize its importance. We earnestly believe that every exhibitor will be wholly satisfied with the results of showing it in his house. It is not a story nor a tract in any clear sense; but a picture of life. It deals with terrible things; defective children, and shows how society is taking care of them and what the conditions are that cause mental defects. It also shows what the difficulties are in properly caring for these unfortunates. If we can say anything to further this picture, we will be doing a good work, and we feel, too, that the exhibitor as well as the public will profit by it. Surely the maker of it deserves the commendation of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD and all patriotic minded citizens.

"BETWEEN TWO FIRES" (Lubin), January 8.—A war-time melodrama with little that is really new, although the situation at the end is effective melodramatically. This closing incident comes after a reel and a half of such trite things as lost memory. There are no especially worthy battle scenes, but there are some moonlight pictures in which the smoke of battle rises in silver clouds. We doubt whether such a picture makes a truly acceptable offering, except in places where not many shows have been given. The script is by George Terwilliger and was produced by Edgar Jones.

"THE WITNESS TO THE WILL" (Edison), January 9.—One of the good old-time will stories, presented from start to finish in a thoroughly workmanlike manner. The scenario was written by Gordon V. May, and in the cast appear Richard Neill, Harry Beaumont, Gertrude McCoy, Jessie Stevens and Benj. F. Wilson. George A. Lessey acted as director. The story is allowed to tell itself smoothly and naturally and from the standpoint of general construction it is a model. An old theme delightfully handled.

"THE HOUR AND THE MAN" (Essanay), January 9.—The first reel of this opens up an interesting situation, with two brothers in love with the same girl, but numerous scenes are obscure in meaning. Close, fragmentary photography is often artistic, but was here used at too critical a time. The quality of the photography itself is excellent and helps the picture wonderfully. The scenes in the second reel are strong and convincingly portrayed. Francis X. Bushman, Ruth Stonehouse, Clara Smith and Wm. Bailey appear in the pleasing cast.

"THE MINISTER'S DAUGHTER" (Patheplay), January 10.—The story of a hopeless love, beautifully pictured in two reels of sepia tinted film. Henny Porten appears as the girl and makes a splendid appeal to the observers. The plot is simple and depends for its strength upon the sincerity of the acting and very pathetic situation which develops. The opening scenes in the first reel are attractive, the garden settings being idealistic for the love scenes. The girl dies of a broken heart in the church after watching her father marry Jack to his cousin Dora. A powerful offering of its kind.

"OFFICER JOHN DONOVAN" (Vitagraph), January 10.—This is an absorbing two-reel number, featuring Van Dyke Brook as a policeman, who subsequently becomes a detective. Leo Delaney appears as the wayward son and Kate Price and Norma Talmadge are in the cast. This is a straight-away crook story, with good views of the gang's headquarters. The raid in the second reel is exciting and the substitution of the detective for Mike Ellis was done very convincingly. Realistic crook drama.

"INDIAN BLOOD" (Kalem), January 12.—A rather ordinary story of army post and Indian tribe. It is not a love story, but its interest centers in mother and son. One is an Indian woman, the other is a half-breed and they are wife and son of an army lieutenant and live at the post. The development is logical and the script shows carefully writing. Of the staging, too, we can find little, except to commend, but, while it interests, there is nothing very noteworthy about it. All it shows is possible, none of it is very convincing. It is not a story that has appeal; is a bit unpleasant. Not better than fair.

"THE TWO ORDEALS" (Selig), January 12.—This is the second of the "Adventures of Kathlyn" series; a very remarkable picture that is attracting attention. It has been noticed at length in THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD for January 17, 1914, page 266. We still think that it is a mistake to offer motion picture stories serially. The better the story, the more the dissatisfaction.

Independent

"A MUD BATH ELOPMENT" (Rex), January 22.—No one can find any objection to this sprightly comedy, unless it be in the exaggerated characterization of the English lord, who competes with a very enterprising young American for the hand of a girl whose father has the gout and a bad temper. Robert Leonard plays the part of the successful rival. The final scenes are laid at a health resort noted for its mud baths.

"ADMISSION TWO PINS" (Victor), January 9.—By giving a show whose admission is two pins, the children of a quarrelsome father and mother teach their elders a lesson in behavior. The manner in which this idea is worked out in this little comedy is very charming. It will have a wide appeal.

"THE SAINT AND THE SINGER" (Powers), January 26.—This offering is only fairly successful, the plot being rather weak. It pictures a young husband at a stag dinner who falls in love with a cabaret singer. He is next shown at home in the morning and tells his wife a great story to allay her suspicions. The doctor advises cracked ice on his head for a week. Rather shy on plot.

"HER BROTHER" (Frontier), January 17.—The outlaw in this drama of the West is shot in both arms during an exciting pistol contest with a sheriff and while there can be no objection to such an incident, the producer might have dispensed with showing the actor's arms too near the camera. The turn given the story when the Indians appear and force the duelists to join forces against the common enemy, is unexpected and adds much to the strength of the production.

"SLIM AND THE MONEY POT" (Frontier), January 15.—Slim, whose antics throughout in this comedy are laughable, falls asleep in a haystack behind a barn and dreams of finding a large fortune in an old iron pot. He is not very long wasting his substance and when it is gone from him he wakes up to find that he has never possessed anything except the shadow. Slim is a fairly good comic character, but he does not have any great opportunity in this story. It is lacking a little in genuine holding power.

"ADRIFT IN A GREAT CITY" (Thanhouser), January 13.—This film presents a section of real life, beginning with an accident that was well pictured. It is not, however, a strong offering, as there is not enough plot and the photography is cloudy in places.

"TWO LITTLE DROMIOS" (Thanhouser), January 11.—This single reel works up so entertainingly that the story could well be carried through a second reel. Mignon Anderson plays the double part of a country and city girl, double exposure being used to advantage. The country girl comes to the city; the city girl goes to a masquerade as a country girl and they are thus confused. But the story hardly seemed complete as it stands.

"COALS OF FIRE" (Thanhouser), January 16.—A pleasing story with a slight plot, in which Riley Chamberlain appears as an old man discharged unjustly. The Thanhouser Kidlet, daughter of his employer, is the means of restoring the old man to his place. A pretty story with a touch of heart interest in it.

"A TICKET TO RED HORSE GULCH" (Majestic), January 11.—Wm. Garwood, an electrician out of a job, finds a railroad ticket to Red Gulch. Later, when there is a race on to file a mining claim, he taps a telephone wire and has his sweetheart register the claim ahead of the villain. Nothing very new in this, but it works up entertainingly and has a pleasing close.

"TRICKED BY A PHOTO" (Reliance), January 26.—Quite a brisk little crook story, in which the detective substitutes the picture of Biff for his own. This so angers the girl that she gives Biff up. Not a very elevating type of plot, but well handled, with George Siegman, Irene Hunt and George De Carlton in the cast.

"OUR MUTUAL GIRL" (Reliance), January 19.—Norma Phillips, an attractive young member of the Reliance Company, in this number begins her adventures as the Mutual Girl. She arrives in New York at the Pennsylvania station and later is seen looking at new gowns in the salesrooms of a modiste. Many of the gowns are indicated by name in the sub-titles, giving an advertising flavor to the film. The Mutual Girl's experiences bid fair to prove interesting, though not much plot has as yet developed.

A CIRCUMSTANTIAL NURSE" (Princess), January 9.—This picture is based on several old and improbable situations, one of them being where the burglar replaces a roll of bills to attend the sick baby. Yet with the aid of good photography and capable acting this gets hold of the interest and proves acceptable.

"JAKE'S HOODOO" (Majestic), January 13.—A lot of farcical situations in this, which bring an occasional smile. The young man about to be married loses his trousers and borrows Mr. Henpeck's. Later he returns the garments and all ends happily. The photography is good.

"THE HIDDEN CLUE" (Reliance), January 24.—Quite a good little mystery is solved in this. The excitement centers about a jewel robbery. The clerk, who heard the burglars forcing entrance, leaves a curious typewritten note, indicating where he has placed the gems. Thos. R. Mills, Paul Scardon, Harry Spingler, Anna Laughlin and other members of the Reliance Company appear.

"THE SON OF THOMAS GRAY" (American), January 10.—This same idea has been used in previous pictures, but it is commendable from the fact that it is directed against drugged patent medicines. The son unknowingly leads the investigation of his own father's quack tonic. Sydney Ayres and Jack Richardson are in the cast.

"TOO MANY BRIDES" (Keystone), January 19.—Sterling courts a number of sweethearts at the same time and succeeds in stirring up a lot of trouble for himself. The chase scene is full of funny antics and moves on to a laughable close.

"WON IN A CLOSET" (Keystone), January 22.—Featuring Mabel Normand in a nonsense number. Her "ideal" was a laugh in himself and the numerous entanglements into which the love affair is precipitated prove very diverting.

"REBECCA'S WEDDING DAY" (Keystone), January 24.—The Fat Boy impersonates a Yiddish girl in this. The characterizations are full of a rough type, but the complications are quite funny and will no doubt please many observers.

"THE POOLROOM' '(Powers), January 23.—This spirited production, Edwin August in the lead, preaches a sermon against the evils often connected with poolrooms. Mr. August gives a good characterization in the dope fiend who warns an innocent newcomer in one of these bad poolrooms to stay out of it.

"O YOU PUPPY" (Crystal), January 27.—The idea developed in this little farce would make an excellent basis for a more elaborate production. Two young people are accidentally thrown together in a room which has been quarantined on account of smallpox. In their efforts to escape we are given some good fun.

"HIS VACATION" (Crystal), January 27.—Sharing the reel with the above is this story of a man's misfortunes on a vacation. He receives his final blow when he returns to find his sweetheart married to another fellow.

"A DEUCE AND TWO PAIR" (Powers), January 23.—Those poker terms which appear in the title do not refer to the great American game, but to two young couples and a third couple made up of an old maid and any man she can nab, and these people together with a burglar, who impersonates a preacher, are mixed in events which produce a fair comedy. The trouble begins with a pretty girl's attempt to elope with her sweetheart, and the fun is sustained to the end.

"THE LEPER'S COAT" (Rex), January 25.—The idea behind this interesting drama is that fear of a disease is liable to produce its symptons in the one who is too much afraid of it. A Christian Science practitioner appears as one of the characters. Lois Webber plays this part. Rupert Julian plays the part of an ordinary practitioner.

"HE DOES NOT CARE TO BE PHOTOGRAPHED" (Eclair), January 25.—This is a series of animated sketches by the cartoonist, Geo. MacManus. They portray his favorite subject, the "Newlyweds and their Baby."

"AN ENCHANTING VOICE" (Eclair), January 25.—Sharing the reel with the above is this little farce illustrating the power of a good voice. It is rather fantastical.

"SNOBBERY" (Nestor), January 23).—Good photography and an attractive cast of performers do a great deal to make this film story interesting. The plot does not develop in a very compelling manner, but the manner in which the young actress is cleared of the suspicion of theft is not without interest.

"HEAVEN WILL PROTECT THE WORKING GIRL" (Joker), January 24.—This burlesque which, in an extravagant fashion, pictures the woes of the worker, will make laughter, probably in most houses a lot of it. Exaggerated melodrama seems to be having much vogue these days, and when it is well put on there can be no question of its popularity. In this instance the "working girl" made the most of her opportunities.

"JONES' BURGLAR TRAP" (Crystal), January 20.—Jones, troubled by burglarious visitations, has a trap door constructed in his front hallway. But he captures not only the intended ones in this way, but his entire family, including himself, and many others.

"A MIDNIGHT SCARE" (Crystal), January 20.—This should have been entitled in the plural because more than one receives the midnight scare. It divides the reel with the above.

"THE SHADOW OF A CRIME" (Crystal), January 25.—An artificial melodrama that is not made believable, but interests on account of its characters, as acted, and by the fact that it is built on good dramatic scheme. Fair entertainment.

Independent Specials

"THE INFORMER" (Domino), January 22.—A two-reel Irish story, by Richard V. Spencer. This is another tale of the Irish rebellion, with several of the familiar devices for catching the interest. Norah's manner of entrapping Michael put her in a bad light for a heroine. The hero is hanged at the close of the second reel. This is not quite up to former standards, but is by no means uninteresting.

"MICHAEL ARNOLD AND DR. LYNN" (Rex), January 15.—Robert Leonard as Michael Arnold, the disowned son of a man who is found apparently murdered in his bed, plays the lead in this two-reel drama. Suspicion by the connivance of the doctor in the case points to the son as the murderer, he is sentenced to imprisonment for life and escapes to come into his rights. The story is well told and holds the interest.

"THE FLASH OF FATE" (Bison), January 17.—A two-reel Western number in which action is the keynote and perhaps the most commendable quality. The incidents follow swiftly and are frequently confusing; some of them are so improbable as to bring smiles. Yet the offering is an entertaining one in spite of numerous absurdities. The flashing of the mirror by the girl as a signal to her lover was a good piece of business.

"THE PRIMITIVE CALL" (Domino), January 15.—A two-reel number in which the hero is a despondent young man, tired of the veneer of civilization. His sea voyage winds up in a shipwreck and his subsequent adventures on an island inhabited by semi-savages make an absorbingly interesting story, even though the situations have been used before. He marries a native girl and later, after his return to civilization, yields to the call of the primitive and goes back to her. The scenic features of this are admirable and the action pleasing.

"DESTINIES FULFILLED" (American), January 12.—A three-reel offering, with Sydney Ayres and Vivian Rich in the leads. Vivian Rich plays both mother and daughter as the mountain romance advances, making good personal appeal. The plot complications are not without some confusion, but maintain the attention. The scene at the bedside of the dying mother struck us as too hysterical. Many of the scenic effects are pleasing and as a whole the production is one of fair strength.

"THE FAITH OF HER FATHERS" (Reliance), January 17.—In this number Irene Hunt appears as a young Jewess who loves a Christian. She intends giving up a young man of her own faith for him, but later developmets bring a change in this decision. The plot of this is quite original, although the motive has been used before. It is well photographed and nicely acted throughout, making altogether an attractive release of its type.

"COMING HOME" (Eclair), January 21.—A two-reel number, with Alec Francis and Belle Adair in the leading parts. The girl is encouraged by the minister to play a part in an amateur production. Later, after their marriage, she undertakes the recuperate the family funds by regular theatrical work. The happiness of the family is threatened, but the wife abandons the project before it is too late. The film story, while not a powerful one, has in it a good deal that interests and entertains the observer. It is well acted.

"THE UNSIGNED AGREEMENT" (Gold Seal), January 20.—Francis Ford and Grace Cunard, one as an old mill owner and the other as the daughter of a poor millhand, play to very good effect in this two-reel drama which, while the story is not always as clear as it might be, portrays some mob violence, including the blowing up of the mill, which is praiseworthy, and the acting is commendable. The son of the mill owner, skipping the country because he thinks he has committed murder, leaves behind him a sweetheart, who is about to become a mother. This is the beginning of the drama and it moves to a satisfactory ending.

"FOR THE FREEDOM OF CUBA" (Bison), January 24.—One of the leading actors in this two-reel drama of Cuba's fight for liberty is a trained Arabian horse. The story is characterized by hard fighting and an exciting prison escape at which the horse greatly assists. The hero is a young American, who defends a wealthy Cuban's daughter from the advances of a rascal. After a number of adventures, during which the father becomes the debtor of the American, the young people marry. The reconciliation with the Spanish officer at the end is a novel touch. Some of the scenes are excellent.

"THE MILITANT" (Imp), January 12.—In this three-reel drama concerning militant suffragettes in England occur some very good mob scenes and we are introduced to a world of activity, which is refreshing for its newness in motion pictures. The story is not in the least melodramatic and shows careful thought and an appreciation of dramatic values. A certain rigidity in the construction might have been avoided by crossing the main theme with a lesser and lighter one, and though a certain sameness of characters was almost unavoidable, yet some way might have been found to make the contrasts sharper. But on the whole we must compliment Calder Johnstone, who wrote the play. He gave the producer an excellent scenario to work from.

"THE SIGN OF THE SECRET NINE" (Lewis Pennant).—A three-part offering made in Europe, but with little that is especially European in its atmosphere; in truth it is a cheaply staged picture, made mostly in a studio and with a dissatisfying story as cheap and untruthful. There are some good scenes, for the photography is acceptable and there are some excellent street scenes.

At the Sign of the Flaming Arcs

By George Blaisdell.

DANIEL FROHMAN, managing director of the Famous Players Film Company, will sail for Cuba on January 22 at the head of thirty players. In the party will be Director J. Searle Dawley and Mme. Kalich. The latter will portray the title role in "Marta of the Lowlands." It is the intention while away to take all the exterior scenes in the play named and also of "The Pride of Jennico." It is believed that the scenic splendors and atmosphere of the big semi-tropical island will add much to the pictorial value of these two productions. Distance counts for little in these days of big pictures.

We had been watching the taking of scenes in "The Pride of Jennico" in the Famous Players studio. In the picture was a young woman as to whose identity we were curious. The features suggested no one we had known on the screen—and yet there was something about her that held the attention. Inquiry brought out the information that it was Miss Harte, and the visitor was introduced to the young woman. The writer suggested that he knew on the screen Miss Betty Harte, formerly with the Selig Company and later with the Edison—had seen her many times. To his amazement the young woman said in rather puzzled fashion: "But I am Betty Harte." In explanation the dark-eyed player said the failure to recognize in the life one so familiar on the screen was undoubtedly due to the black wig, which she very truly said much changed her appearance. Asked as to how she liked New York, where she has been living since August, Miss Harte said: "I think it is fine. Better than on the Coast? No, no, no! There's no place like Los Angeles."

Charles Eldridge, who for two years following September, 1911, appeared in Vitagraph pictures, is now working in stock at the Imp studio in Eleventh Avenue. Mr. Eldridge, who during his Vitagraph connection played much in comedies, is a most competent actor. He has had a wide experience on the stage, having, as he says himself, played in all kinds of attractions, from "Uncle Tom's Cabin" up to Charles Frohman's. Mr. Eldridge was born in New York State. His education was finished at Elmwood Institute, Lanesboro, in Western Massachusetts. For some time he was with Augustin Daly and later with Augustus and Daniel Frohman. For two years he was with Richard Mansfield as stage manager and actor, playing Inspector Newcomer in the first New York production of "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde" at the Madison Square Theater in 1887. Under Charles Frohman he was stage manager of the same house in the summer of 1889, where Miss Minnie Maddern (later Mrs. Fiske) was starring in "Featherbrain." Other productions in which he played were "Humbug," "The Millionaire," "Never Again," "Because She Loved Him So," "Sherlock Holmes," four seasons as Zeke Sweeny in "David Harum," three seasons as Deacon Wiggleford in "The Girl from Rectors," and in the original production of "A Gentleman of Leisure" with Douglas Fairbanks. In pictures Mr. Eldridge's work is in the knowledge of screen followers. He was in many productions with John Bunny and with Miss Turner. So it will be seen that it is a ripe experience that the new Imp player brings to the Universal.

A jury in Frankfort, Ky., made short work of a charge that E. K. Lyon, proprietor of the Grand picture show, violated the State law by opening on Sunday. It said Mr. Lyon was not guilty. There were three sets of instructions given to the jury, but this one is the judge's version of the law: "The jury is instructed that the law regards that as necessary which the common sense of the country in its ordinary mode of doing business regards as necessary, and applies to the manners, habits and customs of the people it affects." So some of the good people of Frankfort are claiming that according to the verdict, picture shows on Sunday are a necessity.

"Les Miserables" will be shown in New York City at the Carnegie Lyceum beginning January 26. The Gordon Brothers Amusement Company, which has the right for this nine-part subject for New York and New England, will install in the Lyceum a great Moller organ. That this fine adaptation of Hugo's story may have the proper musical accompaniment, Gordon Brothers announce that Richard Henry Warren, organist and choirmaster at the Church of the Ascension in New York City, will be at the keys. "Les Miserables," which it will be remembered is an Eclectic production, was shown for six weeks in the spacious Tremont Temple in Boston. So insistent have been the demands for another run that it is likely the picture will again be installed in this famous house.

Albert Blinkhorn, who has the American agency for Turner Films and Hepworth's, was telling the other day a real Christmas story. It savored of the holiday spirit—of real good fellowship. Mr. Blinkhorn has been away from England but twelve months. Although he came to New York a stranger entering upon a comparatively new occupation and naturally unacquainted with local conditions and customs, he has not only made many friends, but he has materially prospered. It seems that back in London Mr. Blinkhorn had five particular "pals." To one of these a couple of weeks before Christmas Mr. Blinkhorn sent a message of seasonal greetings and suggested that he get the five together on the day before the big holiday and "have something on him." He inclosed a five-dollar bill. Likewise to the four others he sent an identical letter. He has recently been receiving the returns. The meeting came off just as Mr. Blinkhorn had planned. When it dawned on the quintet that there was $25 in the party with which to drink the health of their absent friend there was only one thing to do—and the five accordingly proceeded to spend the money. You may have one guess as to what happened.

AMERICAN ACTORS FOR ITALY.

News comes from Turin, Italy, that the New Photo Drama Production Co., formed by George Kleine and two associates, will specialize in the production of spectacular features of multiple reel length. It is the purpose of the new company to take the better class of dramatic talent from America and surround them with the atmosphere and superior facilities of the Italian studio. Mr. Kleine is now in the market for the right sort of talent to spend six months of the year on the Continent in work for him. Mr. Kleine writes that the site obtained for the new studio constitutes one of the most beautiful gardens in Turin and is ample enough to permit the staging of fifty scenes at the same time.

"Germinal."

A Five-Part Adaptation by Pathe from the Novel by Zola.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

AT THEIR best the Pathe productions are unbeatable. When the subject is congenial that company can do wonders in filming. It is at its best in "Germinal." The original production consisted of no less than eight reels. Three thousand feet were eliminated, not because there was an inch of deviation from the one uniform standard of excellence, but solely for the purpose of compressing the action and subduing the realism of Zola, which in spots is stronger and sterner than either stage or screen can bear. I tried to view the pictures with the eyes of one to whom the names of Zola or "Germinal" meant nothing and I am bound to say that, making all allowances for the grim and graphic pen of Zola, these pictures tell the story of Lantier and the cruel labor war that raged in and about the mines far more effectively and far more plainly than the novel itself.

Scene from "Germinal" (Pathe).

The story of "Germinal" briefly told is as follows: Lantier, a poor wandering workman, obtains employment in the mines at Montsou, France. He falls in love with Catherine, the daughter of a foreman in the mines. This brings him into conflict with Chaval, a friend of the foreman's family.

The engineer, Negrel, finds the shoring timbers holding up the earth in a bad state and ready to fall. The company posts a notice saying that because the woodwork has to be repaired the price received by the miners will be decreased. A mass meeting is called for at the Cabaret Rasseneur and Souvarine, an anarchistic workman advocates violent measures. Lantier opposes this and suggests concerted action.

In the meantime Catherine, though in love with Lantier, dares not go back on her word to Chaval and marries him.

Chaval treacherously carries full information of the strike proceedings to Mr. Hennebeau, the chief director of the company and accepts pay for being a spy. The strike is now on amid general enthusiasm.

Chaval, taking advantage of the growing misery among the miners, urges some of them back to work. While they are in the mines the other strikers cut the elevator ropes. The imprisoned miners finally escape by ladders but have to run the gauntlet of the enraged strikers who still hold out.

Chaval goes to Hennebeau and denounces the miners' leaders, especially Lantier.

The strikers' movement is finally crushed and instigated by Chaval they vote to resume work. Lantier, emerged from his refuge, tries in vain to dissuade them but his influence is gone and bowing to the majority he also goes back to work. Souvarine, alone implacable, determines upon desperate measures. He releases the bolts binding the barriers that hold back water from flooding the mine and the floods break loose. He is drowned in the cataclysm that follows. Some escape, others, among them Lantier, Catherine and Chaval, are caught. They have little food and when, after long hours, Catherine attempts to give a little of her lunch to Lantier, Chaval furiously opposes. Chaval finally attempts to deprive his wife by force of her morsel of food. In righteous rage Lantier strikes him and kills him.

The workmen unite in the work of rescue. By imprudence, however, an explosion takes place which kills many of the rescuers. Among those killed is Catherine's brother. When the workers finally pierce the intervening walls they find only Lantier alive for Catherine lies dead in his arms.

In its present state the feature is absolutely free from waste. The skill of the adapter and director is beyond all praise. He has given us a picture in which the action is swift, clear and dramatic; every climax comes with telling force and the appeal to the heart is present everywhere. The acting is next to absolute perfection. Every one of the artists from Lantier, Chaval and Catherine down to the mumbling old man in the cottage of Mayheu, fully entered into the spirit of Zola and gave a faultless rendition of his part. The men and women are completely merged in their characters; we forget that they are actors, most willingly do we yield to the conviction that these figures moving on the screen are true incarnations of the types that came out of Zola's teeming brain. Pink tea fiction and specimens of scented literature are not to be found in the whole range of Zola's works, his realism is at times oppressive because of its tragic truth.

In this feature the exhibitor will find a wealth of genuine and soul-stirring sensations, not the kind that are dragged in by the hair, but the kind that grow out of a logical plot. Such sensations make up the essence of every successful dramatic production. "Germinal" is several thousand miles away from the conventional melodrama. It vibrates with the real life all around us.

The most interesting character in the story (not a heroine), is Catherine, a young woman born into the toilsome poverty of the mines, going down into the bowels of the earth with the men. She possesses greater courage than all the men who go to work with her. The scene where she calmly defies the hooting, hissing mob and forces a passage through the ranks of the infuriated strikers is one of the finest and strongest ever portrayed on the screen. We realize that we stand in the presence of a gifted artiste, a full grown mistress of her craft and we delight in paying homage to such unwonted power.

The struggles in the depths of the shaft, after Souvinar, the anarchist, has flooded the mines, are indescribably realistic. The photography, of the best Pathe standard throughout, is perfection itself in all the scenes under the earth. I have never seen it surpassed and I doubt whether it has ever been equalled. One of the strongest moments in the book is Zola's description of the entombed Catherine who, with her lover Lantier and her husband Chaval, has been caught in a flooded trap from which there seems no escape. How much more impressive than the printed page is this scene on the screen. The fierce strife for the last piece of bread, the revelation of the craven heart of Chaval and the unconquerable courage of Lantier are portrayed with consummate skill; the tremendous strength of the scene is always tempered with a delicate, humanizing touch. While not a particle of the tragic power is sacrificed, there is an art of telling the truth which takes away all possibility of offense.

The good old word "masterpiece" has been so foully abused by the press agents that he who wants to confine words to their proper meaning is tempted to hesitate in employing the word at all. No question of the appropriateness of the great word arises when applied to "Germinal." It is in the true sense of the word a "masterpiece."

"The Shadows of the Moulin Rouge"

A Solax Feature In Four Parts.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

THIS is undoubtedly the best feature that ever came out of the Solax studio. It was directed by Madame Blache who has made notable progress in the art of staging and directing feature productions.

The story is distinctly French in plot and in flavor. The idea of the play has evidently been taken from one of the best tales of Balzac. Balzac was a master of invention and in proper hands his works ought to be a treasure house for the producer who does not specialize in freak features. The directress has achieved such pronounced success in this instance because she has understood how to condense and how to keep away from the diffuse style of the Balzac narrative. This, however, is by no means the only merit of the play. The plot hinges on the substitution of a dead woman for a living one. A series of thrilling, and at times mystifying, adventures follow, the interest of the spectator is kept at high tension through every change in the situation while every trace of confusion is happily and skillfully avoided. In the course of the story, and as necessary parts of its development, many of the famous and some of the notorious resorts of Parisian life are introduced. The arrangement of the groups in these scenes, the settings and the selection of characteristic types entitle the director to great credit.

With all the sensations in the plot, and with all the introductions of scenes from the seamy side of life, there is not the faintest trace of any objectionable feature. The acting in this production is decidedly above the average. Throughout I noticed the sympathetic and intelligent co-operation between directress and artists, without which no good picture is possible and which is doubly important in the production of a feature of some pretensions.

Another point of merit, which must not be passed over, is the absence of lost motion. It would be impossible to cut even fifty feet from this feature without endangering its dramatic development and dulling the edge of its climaxes. The settings are superb all the way through and the highest praise must be bestowed upon the photography and the camera work generally.

We are informed that suit has been instituted against Warner's Features, Inc., for moneys due the Gardner Company.

FAMOUS PLAYERS SECURE MADAME KALICH.

The Famous Players Film Company will shortly present the illustrious artist Madame Kalich in a pretentious and spectacular film version of "Marta of the Lowlands." Madame Kalich attained separate dramatic triumphs in the stellar roles of "Monna Vanna," "The Kreutzer Sonata," "The Light of St. Agnes," and more recently "Rachel." "Marty of the Lowlands," the subject selected for Mme. Kalich's first appearance in motion pictures, possesses a big, gripping theme. Marta, a young orphan, reared in poverty, meets a wealthy mill owner who gives her shelter and protection at the cost of the innocent girl's honor. She looks upon him not as a lover or friend, but as her master. Later the master becomes financially ruined and marries an heiress. Still infatuated with Marta, he marries her to an honest, untutored shepherd of the highlands, so that, undetected, he might continue his relations. The shepherd is unaware of her past, but subsequently learns it, and though he loves Marta with a primitive strength, the knowledge keeps them apart. In Marta's heart a great love springs up for the simple shepherd, a love that opens her eyes to her past degradation, and she spurns the mill owner. The shepherd learns that the master is responsible for Marta's sorrows, seeks him out, and returns to Marta telling her in the simple language of the shepherd, "I have killed the wolf!" Marta and he are reconciled, and they find peace and happiness in the hills. Madame Kalich is remarkably suited, in type and temperament, for the role of Marta.

PHILLUMMINDIL ENTERTAINS.

Philip Mindil, head of the publicity department of the Mutual Film Corporation, entertained at luncheon on Saturday, January 10, a dozen representatives of the trade press. The party gathered at the Masonic Club, in Twenty-third Street, at 1 o'clock, and sat down to a real feed. Assisting Mr. Mindil was Hopp Hadley. After a couple of hours around the board the Mutual's publicity chief escorted his guests to the projection room of the Mutual, where was witnessed the showing of "The Great Leap," the Reliance four-reel subject directed by Walter Christie Cabanne and featuring Mae Marsh and Robert Harron. It is a stirring and dramatic feud story. Following this was the first reel of "The Mutual Girl," in which Norma Phillips is shown as a country girl coming to New York to visit her aunt and being fitted out with a wardrobe that is up to date, in preparation for her coming entertainment. In the projection room watching the picture together with the trade press men were Harry E. Aitken, Charles O. Baumann, Roy Aitken, W. A. Seligsberg, J. A. Naulty and Mr. Peckham.

It was a complete and most pleasant occasion.

CHICAGO LETTER

BY JAS. S. McQUADE.

A CAMPAIGN to bring public support to Maj. M. L. C. Funkhouser, second deputy superintendent of police, in his fight to prevent the presentation of immoral subjects in moving picture theaters, is to be waged by some of the largest women's organizations in the city.

Among those enlisted in the movement are Mrs. Joseph T. Bowen and Mrs. Gertrude Howe Britton, of the Juvenile Protective Association; Mrs. Israel Cowen, of the Association of Jewish Women; Mrs. George Bass, Mrs. Henry Solomon, Mrs. George Bean, and Mrs. Herman Landauer, of the Chicago Woman's Club, and Miss Harriet Vittum, of the Northwestern University Settlement and president of the Woman's City Club.

It is expected that a large array of organizations will be brought into the movement during the next two weeks. Some of the women have been shown films blacklisted and have indorsed the decisions.

Anent this movement of the good women of Chicago the Record Herald has expressed itself, editorially, thus:

"Leading women of Chicago have rallied to the support of Major Funkhouser and his censorship for the moving picture films. Representative women have personally inspected some of the suppressed pictures and unhesitatingly commended the adverse verdict of the censor. The Record Herald is assured that these films are veritable schools of crime and delinquency, and that no board of reputable, broad-minded business men would think of reversing the decision of the police guardians of public morals and public decency.

"That political pull, threats and misrepresentation are used, or are likely to be used, by the would-be producers of the objectionable films to discredit Major Funkhouser one is fully prepared to believe. We know to what lengths certain unscrupulous managers have gone in New York in the effort to commercialize the public interest in white slavery. An appeal to decent and healthy public sentiment hardly ever fails in such cases, and if Major Funkhouser is encountering serious trouble and insidious opposition in his discharge of the duties of his office, publicity is his best weapon and the earnest support of his work by the high-minded women—and men—of the city his best shield.

"It is manifestly possible for a police censorship to err unduly on the side of restriction. But the dangers of a let-alone policy are much greater. The tests applied to films, plays and other amusements should, of course, be tests backed by common sense and enlightened regard for public morality. There is not a scintilla of evidence that Major Funkhouser has attempted to suppress anything that is fit to be seen and enjoyed."

I challenge the correctness of the last sentence of the editorial opinion just quoted, and am ready to show that there is strong evidence to prove that Major Funkhouser has gravely erred, both in "common sense and in enlightened regard for public morality." I refer to his action in revoking the license of "The Master in the Garden," after that film had been passed by censors from the City Hall and by Mrs. Gertrude Howe Britton. It had been running for two weeks, and the Selig Polyscope Company, whose product it is, was literally flooded with letters of commendation and praise from many sections of the country.

I saw this film for the first time in the private exhibition room of that company, and there were present on that occasion prominent business men of St. Louis, all of them men of family and, like myself, sticklers for clean, uplifting moving picture subjects. These men have nearly half a million dollars invested in the best modern type of moving picture theaters, and the general manager makes it a point to censor personally all films booked for the various houses on their circuit, cutting out any scenes that in his judgment might be objectionable to patrons, and restoring the cutouts to their proper places before returning such films to the exchange.

After the film was run, feeling deeply affected by the injustice done the principal woman character in the photo-drama by an unprincipled man whom society permitted to go free, I asked these visitors—among them a man who had held the position of judge for many years—what they thought of it. All pronounced it stronger than any sermon they had ever heard on such a subject.

The producer was an artist, Colin Campbell by name, and he had been careful to spare the nice feelings of spectators from any vulgar or offensive scene or action. It was distinctly a heart appeal to the best that there is in all of us; for not a single instant did it make for unrighteousness.

If such filmed subjects are to be censored out of existence by the Major Funkhousers of our time and the short sighted, good women who work with them, I challenge them to visit our best churches on Sundays and prevent the godly men who fill the pulpits from preaching sermons that touch on the evils that menace the progress of the human race. These acknowledged and duly accredited censors of public morals, if they be true to their calling and follow in the footsteps of the great Master, are not always so nice and tender in their denunciation of evil as is this filmed story, entitled "The Master in the Garden."

Will the editor of the Record-Herald, who is responsible for the foregoing article, please come with me and view for himself, at a private presentation, the film in question? I shall be willing to abide by his decision; for there is more than a scintilla of evidence that Major Funkhouser has suppressed a film that is fit to be seen and enjoyed, and to be benefited by.

Chicago Premier of "Antony and Cleopatra."

Earlier than was expected, George Kleine's "Antony and Cleopatra" was given its Chicago premier presentation at the American Music Hall, Sunday evening, January 11.

Amy Leslie, the widely known dramatic critic of the Chicago News, wrote the following paragraphs in an extensive review of the films:

"For those criers in the wilderness who predict wordless drama, the plastic theater and silhouette story telling for the stage, a mighty throb of assurance arrives in entertainments as wonderfully eloquent as Kleine's 'Antony and Cleopatra' unveiled at the American Music Hall last evening before an awed and inspired crowd.

"'Antony and Cleopatra,' gorgeously and sensationally presented with actors of Rome acting as the Romans do, arrived last evening at the music hall and held the audience in a spell no manner of word of mouth or poet could have wrought. Cavalcades and mobs with thousands of scurrying horses, marshaled hosts and a crush of human warriors seem the living things, so vividly is the great picture brought out. Opening with Antony landing his army on the banks of the Cydnus, the story reels itself into the emotions with fascinating variants of movement, big, gentle, intoxicating and inspiring. The daughter of the Ptolemies is superbly enacted by Gonzales, and Antony is one of the Novellis—all good actors in Italy. Mathilde had Charmian preserved intact, instead of being cut down to a page, and she was most attractive and tragic. The great love scenes were almost suffocatingly real and splendid in environment and decorations. The gathering of the Roman fleet in the Nile is something every school, college and academy ought to see, so vivid, so rhetorical and magnificently dramatic is the historical crawl in the waves' edges and the fabulous maneuvers of Octavius' warriors. Cleopatra discovering Charmian's love for Antony has her whipped and disgraced and thrown to the crocodiles of the Nile. And the huge brutes of the waters crawl up to the marbles' glistening ledge and dive into the water when Charmian's lacerated body is tossed to them. Thus can the silent drama outstrip mere poetic words, words, words! They do not say so. They do it. It is indescribably poetic and tragic, the potent, romantic sensations being almost too flagrantly expressive, too full for utterance by all means."

An orchestra of nine pieces played appropriate music and the projection was excellent.

Matinee prices for this great subject in Chicago are 25 and 50 cents; evening, 50, 75 and $1.00.

Mr. Cohen returned to New York Sunday, January 11th.

One evening last week I chanced to see at the Parkway Theater "Hearts and Flowers," sweetly pretty in story and production, and delightfully artistic in acting. This one-reel regular release is a gem of its kind, and affords convincing evidence that a one-reel subject often gives greater satisfaction than a stretched-out multi-reel story. Francis X. Bushman and the child actress in this poem in pictures keeps the spectator on the verge of tears or silent laughter.

The Majestic Theater, Columbus, O., was opened January 12. Included on the strong programs offered during the week were: "Wild Animals at Large" (Vitagraph), "In the Midst of the Jungle" (Selig), "The President's Pardon" and "The Frozen Trail" (Pathe). Mrs. Fiske in "Tess of the d'Urbervilles" will be on the program January 18 and 19. Admission is five and 10 cents, and for special feature attractions 10 and 20 cents.

Mr. and Mrs. E. R. Pearson, of Omaha, were in the city last week and returned home January 12. Mr. Pearson is branch manager of the G. F. Co. in that city. He told me that the Royal Theater, a new house in Sioux City, Ia., which opened two weeks ago, is doing splendid business with Exclusive programs of the G. F. Co. The Royal seats 800 people. He also informed me that "The Third Degree" is making a big success in Omaha and adjacent territory.

J. H. Petrea, formerly owner of the Gem Theater, Milford, Ill., was a visitor last week. He stated that he had purchased the Star Theater in his home town and that he is remodeling it into a modern picture house, which will be henceforth known as the Gem Theater. This theater, when completed, will seat 250 people. It will be opened about January 31st, and Universal programs will be used. Admission will be five and ten cents. Mr. Petrea formerly owned the Star Theater, in Watseka, Ill. He complimented the World on its magnificent work and renewed his subscription.

Charles J. Schaefer opened his new house, the Keystone, at 3912 Sheridan Road, this city, on December 17. This theater is one of the most architecturally beautiful in the city. Mr. Schaefer states that he is now figuring on a plan for a big modern moving picture theater, on the North Side, that will seat 1,600 people. Mr. Schaefer is now operating the Lyceum, the Garfield and the Keystone. He uses the Moving Picture World in all of his houses.

Charles Sherman, formerly a part owner of the Acme Motion Picture Operators' School, called at the World office and subscribed for that publication. Mr. Sherman stated that he intends opening a moving picture operators' school in Room 304, Times Building, 102 N. Fifth Ave., about the middle of the month. Mr. Sherman is an expert mechanic in electrical and motion picture machinery.

N. W. Aronson, owner of the Argmore Theater, 1040 Argyle St., this city, made a pleasant call at our office last week and renewed his subscription. The Argmore is a thoroughly up-to-date, modern theater, with a seating capacity of 664. A modern ventilating plant is installed, which meets all the requirements of the proposed city ordinance on ventilation. The Argmore, with its solid marble entrance, has all the appearance of a modern $2.00 playhouse. Licensed and Famous Players service is used. On Thursday evening, January 8, the first set of "The Adventures of Kathlyn" was shown the second time to over-flowing houses throughout the entire evening. Mr. Aronson found it necessary to call the police to regulate the crowds that clamored for admission. Fifty-one automobiles were counted, lined up on both sides of the street outside. On special feature nights the admission of the Argmore is 10 and 20 cents.

Fire, which broke out in the operator's room, in the Myrtle moving picture theater, on Milwaukee Avenue, this city, the evening of January 7, drove an audience of 300 persons to the street. One girl was trampled upon, but no serious injuries were reported. None of those who wanted to get out of the smoke-filled theater thought of using the exits at the stage end of the auditorium. The fire entailed an estimated damage of $200.

The Chicago hearing of the government's suit against the Motion Picture Patents Co. and the General Film Co. occupied January 8, 9 and 10. The hearing was held in the La Salle Hotel before Special Examiner Edward H. Hacker. The general tone of the testimony tended to show that there was no ground for the charges that the defendant companies were acting in violation of the Sherman anti-trust act.

It is announced that the Mutual Film Corporation is about to add another brand of subject to their program. On Wednesday, every week, a one-reel subject under the title "Beauty Film" will be put on the market. "Withering Roses," the first subject, will be released January 14. It is the intention that comedies as well as dramas of high quality will be released under the new title. Margaret Fischer, a dainty actress with a fine reputation, and Harry Pollard will play the leading roles in these subjects. Both will be seen in the first release, which has already been referred to.

While here, Mr. Lakin had the Chicago censor board pass "The Ghost Club," the first release handled by the Gloria American Co. This is a six-reel subject, handled on the state rights plan, and practically all such rights have been already sold. Mr. Lakin left for Pittsburgh January 9, on his way to New York.

The opening was most successful, and extensive notice was given the event by the local press. Jack London's "Sea Wolf" will follow. The Ziegfeld is a thoroughly modern house, with sumptuous appointments. The Moving Picture World wishes Mr. Hamburger and his associates the greatest success in their latest enterprise. Such houses as the Ziegfeld will do much to uplift the business.

Five Hundred Guests Participate in Festivities in Commemoration of First Anniversary of Fire.

In an outside temperature of more than several degrees below zero, the Thanhouser Company held a reception and ball in its new 100 by 60 glass-covered studio in New Rochelle on the evening of January 13. The occasion marked the first anniversary of the fire which destroyed its plant. Present were more than 500 guests, of whom many came from New York, all of the metropolitan studios being represented. There were also in attendance many of the prominent townspeople, who indicated in various ways the pride they feel in the success of this growing institution. The members of the company provided an entertainment in the form of a cabaret show. Refreshments were served during the evening. There were many calls for a speech from President Charles J. Hite, but he preferred to let his past year's industry speak for itself. Mr. Hite was the recipient of many congratulations for himself and his company. The New Yorkers returned home on a special train which left New Rochelle at 2:06, and their departure from the studio marked the closing of a most enjoyable evening.

BEAUTY FILMS—NEW MUTUAL BRAND.

Under the title of Beauty Film, the Mutual program adds another brand of subject to its output. It is announced that on Wednesday of each week a one-reel subject will be put on the market. The first subject under the title of "Withering Roses," will be released on January 14th. The first subject is a drama that well bears out the name of the brand, and is a fair testimonial of the quality of subjects to follow. It is intended that comedies, as well dramas of highest quality, will be put out.

Margaret Fischer, the world-famous beauty, has been engaged as leading lady, and Harry Pollard will play opposite, as well as produce. An able company of reputable stars has been engaged for the Beauty productions.

Motion Picture Exhibitors' League

CINEMA CLUB BALL.

First Social Affair of Bronx Independent Exhibitors a Huge Success—Prominent Photoplayers Present.

THE Cinema Club, an independent organization of Bronx picture exhibitors, gave its first annual entertainment and ball on Wednesday evening, January 14, at Hunt's Point Palace, Southern Boulevard and 163rd Street, New York. January 14 happened to be the coldest day New York City had had in fifteen years. But the temperature had risen from five degrees below zero in the early morning to about seventeen degrees above when the time came for the ball. Everybody appreciated the rise in temperature, for they turned out in great numbers at the affair. At a conservative estimate we should say that there were three thousand present.

The entertainment started at nearly nine o'clock, and a rapid fire Crystal picture headed the program. It was called "A Sure Cure" and featured Miss Pearl White. It pleased those who witnessed it. This was followed by a three-part Warner's feature entitled "The First Law of Nature." When this picture had been projected, John J. Wittman, president of the Cinema Club, mounted the stage and announced that Joe Brandt would next introduce several of the photoplayers. The first one to be called to the footlights was Irving Cummings of Pathe Freres, who gave a short monologue. He was loudly applauded.

Following the introduction of the famous Pathe player, the four part Universal picture, "Absinthe," featuring King Baggot and Leah Baird, was projected.

The Hon. Douglas Mathewson, president of the Borough of the Bronx, was next introduced. He spoke in appreciation of the Cinema Club and the moving picture. In concluding, he wished the Cinema Club success in its mission.

Joe Brandt then introduced the lively Pearl White, leading woman of the Crystal brand of Universal film. She, too, was loudly applauded for her brief talk and appearance. When Miss White had left the stage Joe announced King Baggot. There was a vivid impression in the minds of those who saw King Baggot's work in "Absinthe," and no sooner had he appeared on the stage when he was given a tremendous ovation. The audience had no sooner quieted down and he finished a little speech about the coming Screen Club ball, to he held on the 31st of this month, when he was greeted with another round of applause.

The next on the "bill of fare" was "For Ireland's Sake," a three part Warner's feature with Gene Gauntier in the leading role. This picture was appreciated by the audience.

The program was brought to an end by a couple of singing acts. The ball-room floor was then cleared of the seats and the grand march began. It was lead by King Baggot, leading man of the Imp brand of Universal pictures, and Miss Gene Gauntier, leading woman of the Gauntier Feature Players of the Warner's Features. During the march Jack Clark, leading man and director of the Gauntier pictures, suddenly disappeared from his box, and just as suddenly appeared on the stage leading the orchestra in comedy style.

After the grand march the dancing and gaiety began and continued until well near daybreak. It was a jolly and happy gathering, and there were in evidence on the ball-room floor quite a number of tango top notchers.

Among the honorary guests were: Hon. D. Mathewson, president of the Borough of the Bronx, District Attorney Martin, Judge Gibbs and Fire Commissioner Robert Adamson.

A few of the companies which had boxes in the balcony were: Warner's Features, Universal Film Mfg. Company, Thomas A. Edison, Inc., Vitagraph Company, Kalem Company, Famous Players, and others. The Board of Censorship had a box as well as each of the honorary guests. So did the Sam Trigger Association.

Among those present were: Gene Gauntier, Jack Clark, King Baggot, Pearl White, Irving Cummings, H. M. Warner and wife, of Warner's Features, Joe Brandt, Joe Farnham, Carl Laemmle, J. C. Graham, Ben Berk (Victor studios), Sam Trigger. The press was represented by George D. Proctor and A. D. Michell, of the Moving Picture News; D. L. Provost, of the Morning Telegraph; Harvey Gates, of the Universal Weekly, and J. A. Archer, of the Moving Picture World.

A Power and a Simplex machine were used to project the pictures.

The entertainment committee consisted of Emanuel Lippman, Mr. Farrell, Philip L. Fleisher, J. Rochman, S. Strauch, and J. H. Hall.

LAST CALL FOR OHIO CONVENTION.

Arrangements Complete for the Annual Meeting—Large Attendance and Big Exhibit Assured.

A MEETING of the committee of arrangements which has charge of the preliminaries for the annual convention of Ohio State Exhibitors' League, was held at the Sinton Hotel, Cincinnati, Ohio, on Tuesday, January 13, to canvass the situation and take care of any loose ends in the plans that might have been overlooked. It was a most enthusiastic gathering and was an indication of the big events that will happen when the real convention occurs on January 26 to 29.

As a part of its promotion work, the committee circularized a large list of exhibitors and just prior to the committee meeting mentioned there had been received about five hundred replies indicating that that number of those addressed would be present at the convention. This was gratifying news to the committee and called forth great enthusiasm.

In addition to the unusual large attendance of exhibitors there promises to be a big turn out of manufacturers, exchange men and supply men. Large space has been reserved at the Sinton Hotel for the accommodation of exhibits and many reservations have already been booked. Every facility for the display of goods and appliances will be provided by the committee in charge. It is reported by the committee that the entire ninth floor of the hotel has been reserved for the uses of the convention.

On Monday, January 26, the Executive Committee of the National League will convene to consider various questions that have been submitted to it by the president. This committee will receive the resignation of Treasurer J. J. Rieder and will appoint his successor to serve until the National Convention in July. Mr. Rieder has indicated his intention to be present if his health will permit. Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday will be occupied with the sessions of the Ohio convention and interspersing social features of which there is a long program, closing with a ball Thursday night.

While the Ohio exhibitors will turn out en masse there will be a large attendance of exhibitors from adjoining states. Kentucky will be represented by the majority of its league members, who will meet in convention at Covington, just across the river from Cincinnati, and adjourn to attend the Ohio meeting. Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, New York and New Jersey will also be represented.

The committee of arrangements is putting forth every effort to make the stay of all visitors comfortable. Badges and tickets, admitting them to the various entertainment features will be distributed carefully so that no one entitled to participate will be overlooked.

Looks like a big event; better arrange to go if you have not already done so.

TO BUILD NEW HOUSE.

L. E. Ach, of Cincinnati, Ohio, will build in Avondale, a suburb of Cincinnati, a motion picture theater to seat between 750 and 850 persons. The house is to be built during the coming spring.

MOTION PICTURE TRADES CLUB.

Movement Started in Texas Promises to Become of Considerable Importance in the Picture Business.

DURING the last state convention of the Texas Exhibitors' League, held at Dallas, a movement was started among the exchange and supply men present to form a club of the representatives of the various concerns dealing with the exhibitor. The prime mover was W. A. Bishop, of the Dallas Seating Company, and his idea met with such general approval that steps were taken to put the organization on a permanent basis. Officers have been elected: W. A. Bishop, president; Ned E. Dipinet, of the Consolidated Film and Supply Company, vice-president, and R. D. Thrash, of the Thrash Film Company, secretary and treasurer, all of Dallas, and a constitution and by-laws adopted.

The membership is limited to the executive heads of the several concerns that supply motion picture exhibitors and its main object is to promote friendliness and sociability among those engaged in the supply business. It is the purpose of the Trades Club to work with and in the interest of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League, especially in promoting state and national conventions and throwing the influence of the supply men upon the side of the exhibitor in legislative matters.

Originally it was proposed to confine the efforts of the Trades Club to the state of Texas, but the plan has been so attractive that it will be extended to other states and a movement is now on foot to start another such club in New Orleans.

According to the constitution of the new organization its official name will be the Motion Picture Trades Club of Texas. Its object, the improvement of the motion picture trade's business in Texas, supplying social and business advantages and the education of its members in progressive business methods. Any male white person may become a member if directly engaged as proprietor, manager, assistant manager or active traveling representative of any domestic or foreign firm or corporation in the film business, or allied business, in the state of Texas, but such membership shall not continue longer than his connection with his respective business.

An initiation fee of five dollars is required with each application and three dollars to cover the first quarter's dues. The annual dues are twelve dollars paid in advance quarterly.

Among the standing committees is one on publicity and extension, the duty of which is to publish information relative to the affairs of the Motion Picture Trades Club as far as is consistent with the interests of the club and to assist in the organization of similar clubs elsewhere.

The Club at Dallas holds regular meetings every Friday and a monthly business meeting on the first Friday of each month. There is also a regular meeting of the Board of Directors on the second Friday of each month

President Bishop writes enthusiastically of the prospects of the new trade organization and believes that it will become deservedly popular wherever men of the trade congregate. The idea is a good one and is almost certain to become general.

MUTUAL FILMS BATTLE OF OJINAGA.

Word has been received in New York from Carl Von Hoffman, the photographer who left New York with his aides on December 27, that he has secured good pictures of the battle of Ojinaga, in which the Mexican federal troops were defeated by the rebels under General Villa. It is said that the film will be in New York early in the week beginning January 19, when work on it will be rushed.

A. WARNER GOES ABROAD.

Mr. A. Warner, of Warner's Features, has taken passage on the Kronprinzessen Cecile which sails January 20, for an extended trip to England and the continent. He will be accompanied by Mrs. Warner. His mission abroad is to purchase features of five and six reels for the Warner service.

LUMIERE FILM OPENS CHICAGO OFFICE.

David Horsley, American agent for Lumiere film, announces the opening of a Chicago office at 30 North Dearborn Street. D. W. Russell, a film man who was formerly located in the Windy City, and who is well acquainted with the old timers there, will be in charge. In the short time Mr. Horsley has had the agency the sale of Lumiere film throughout the Western and Middle Western States has increased to such an extent that representation in this district has become necessary. It is rumored that another office may be opened on the coast in the near future.

FARNUM IN "SQUAW MAN."

Dustin Farnum, last featured on Broadway in "The Littlest Rebel," and before that, famous as the star of "The Squaw Man" and "The Virginian," is now actively engaged on the Pacific Coast, in the title role of "The Squaw Man" for the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company, which will be the first release of that organization.

Dustin Farnum.

Under the direction of Cecil B. De Mille and Oscar Apfel, "The Squaw Man" is fast nearing completion and will reach the market about February 15.

"I've had 'some experiences' since I've been here" wrote Mr. Farnum to a friend. "Last week, while going through a scene in which I am rescued from a hole, by Naturich, the squaw, the cow-pony which pulls me out, developed stage fright, temperament or something and got to bucking. Well, I enjoyed ten minutes of royal rough riding.

"I fell out of a life boat during a rescue scene and was washed under the rudder of an abandoned schooner standing nearby. Had a thrilling experience in my auto when it ran away with me and while De Mille got a few hundred feet of sensational film, I had the fright of my young life. All in all, acting before the camera is considerably more exciting than rehearsing on the stage of the Eltinge Theater.

"It's a great life, full of thrills, requiring great patience and rewarding you with an exhilarating appreciation of the wonderful outdoors."

Mr. Farnum will return east early in February, but will go back to California later for the Lasky people. He contemplates giving up the stage, entirely, for picture work.

PATENT LAWYER DIES.

Richard Nott Dyer Suddenly Succumbs to Attack of Acute Indigestion.

Succumbing to a sudden attack of acute indigestion, Richard Nott Dyer, senior member of the firm of Dyer, Dyer & Taylor, of New York, died on Tuesday, January 13, at his home, 52 Prospect Street, East Orange. The suddenness of Mr. Dyer's death caused a shock to his friends and business associates, who had no reason to believe him in poor health. He was fifty-six years old. A private funeral was held on Friday. Besides his wife he is survived by a daughter, Mrs. Harry Bowers Mingle, of East Orange, and a son, Richard T. Dyer, of New York, four brothers, Commodore George L. Dyer, retired, U. S. N.; Philip S. Dyer, Frank L. Dyer, president of the General Film Company, and Leonard H. Dyer, his partner, and three sisters.

Probably no patent attorney in recent years has had such a varied and active career. Together with many other cases, he has had charge of all important litigation involving the patents of the Motion Picture Patents Company.

PICTURE NIGHT WITH THE PLEIADES.

Pictures were a feature on the social bill of the famous Pleiades Club at its regular Sunday evening meeting at the Brevoort Hotel January 11. About 150 persons gathered in the meeting room and partook of an excellent dinner after which the evening's entertainment was started by G. Warren Langdon, master of ceremonies of the evening. Mr. Langdon opened the proceedings by calling upon Joe Farnham of the All-Star Feature Film Company, who spoke of the improvement in pictures and showed a reel of the latest production of that company, "Paid In Full." A Simplex machine was used in projecting the picture which was well received by the company.

Among the entertainers were Mr. George Grossmith, guest of honor of the evening; George Curtis, John P. Wade, Ruth Helen Davis and others.

Among the picture folk present were: J. Stuart Blackton, W. A. Johnson, Miss Katherine Eggleston, Herbert Miles, George Proctor, H. J. Streychmans, H. B. Coles, W. H. Peckham and James L. Hoff.

Manufacturers Advance Notes

"THE MAN FROM THE WEST" (Lubin).

This is one of Romaine Fielding's strange stories, picturing one of those virile characters of which Fielding is a prototype.

"I dare all that man dare
He who dares more is no man."

Such is the creed of "The Man From the West," a man fearless and born to be a ruler of men, and also of women, a man that none dare kill. A man over whom conventionalities have no power, and the woman loves him for his strength.

Some years before the story a strange man came out of the East and settled in New Mexico. No one knew his history, but he was respected by all. He was a dead shot and a law unto himself. Mr. Stillwell, president of a mining company, came to the town to view the mines and with him his daughter, Rose, and her fiance, Percy. One day in a saloon the young lover was being hazed by Mexican Joe, and the Scene from "The Man from the West" (Lubin).

"Gentleman" arrived upon the scene just in time to prevent serious consequences. Hearing shots fired, Stillwell and Rose were attracted to the saloon and there the girl fell in love with the mysterious gentleman. The Mexican renegade seeking revenge gathered some of his kind together and waylaying Rose, abducted her and took her up into the mountains. The "Gentleman" followed the trail and rescued her and she with her father and Percy returned to Boston. One day the "Gentleman" received a note asking him to come to Boston. He immediately complied and reached the Stillwell mansion in the midst of a "musical." Despite the interference of her father and protests of her social set, Rose defied conventionalities and left her home with the man and master who had won her heart and to whom she was satisfied to trust with her life's happiness.

FAMOUS PLAYERS IN "PRIDE OF JENNICO."

The Famous Players Film Company now have in course of production the celebrated play, "The Pride of Jennico," one of Daniel Frohman's former Lyceum successes, in which the principal characters are to be enacted by House Peters, Hal Clarendon, Peter Lang, Marie Leonhard, Priestly Morrison, Betty Harte, and Emily Calloway. "The Pride of Jennico," is a stirring drama, portraying the conflict of love and hate, hearts and swords, loyalty and intrigue, and the final triumph of Cupid over cupidity. The drama relates how a naughty, whimsical little princess is tamed by love, how a haughty young noble is humbled by the same sweet influence, and how both finally learn the power of the heart over pride and caprice.

THANHOUSER "JOSEPH" RELEASES.

When the hands at New Rochelle have totally recovered from the effects of their Fire Anniversary festivities, they will make another bid for popularity with the release of their long-time-producing "Joseph in the Land of Egypt." This is on February 1, in conformance with their "one a month, on the first of the month" feature release scheme. Marguerite Snow and James Cruze, as Potiphar's wife and Joseph, respectively, are said to have never been seen to better advantage. Their parts and costuming reminds one of this team's work in "She," one of the very first Thanhouser multiple-reel releases. J. Alan Turner has been engaged as technical director of the "Big Productions." C. J. Hite took him from a twenty year connection with the stage as a technical expert, wherein he constructed numerous novel effects for such employers as Augustin Daly and the New York Hippodrome. At the time of the Hudson-Fulton Parade in New York, Mr. Turner acted as chief of construction of the paraphernalia incidental to the staging of this big public event.

FRED MACE GRABS ANOTHER FIGHTER!

Fred Mace must have his fighter! Now it's Leach Cross whom he's picked to fill the place of the late "Bull" Young, who succumbed to a knockout blow and set the reformers of California into a new frenzy about the prize ring. Leach is a careful Jewish gentleman who won't die and who may be depended upon for picture posing as long as there's money in it. So may Leach's whole family for that matter—Eddie Foy and his seven will tremble when Apollo's "A Swell Dish" comes out, for Leachie has brought his home folks into that film and put them over immense! Not as many in the Cross family as in the Foy, of course, but what there are just burn with cleverness and—well, Leach wants you to see the film. Along with Cross, Director Mace has annexed Fred Horby. The latter isn't a fighter or anything uplifting. He's just an actor.

"THE GUERRILLAS OF ALGIERS" (Eclair).

The Eclair Company has been receiving some very flattering testimonials from exhibitors concerning the great business done with that company's "The Guerrillas of Algiers," a three reel feature. One letter from F. H. Rauch, of the Eighth Avenue Amusement Co., of New York, states that one of its houses exhibited the picture to 4800 paid admissions in one day. The letter is very strong, claiming the picture to be the greatest ever shown by that company and stating that it has been booked for a return date.

OUR MUTUAL GIRL.

With the possible exception of the President's daughters, no young girl in America is having the opportunity of meeting so many men and women of affairs as the little actress appearing in the title role of the motion picture presented under the name of "Our Mutual Girl."

The first reel of this loudly heralded picture will be released on Monday, January 19, and a new reel of the story will appear every Monday thereafter for fifty-two weeks.

"Our Mutual Girl" Retiring After a Hard Day's Work.

In the opening chapter of the drama "Our Mutual Girl" is introduced in her simple little home in the country. An invitation from her wealthy New York aunt, who moves in the most exclusive society, brings her to the great city, where she is fitted out with the most beautiful gowns and started upon a career that becomes more and more interesting as the story develops.

Our Mutual Girl has already actually met the leading lights in the musical, theatrical and political world and is being photographed daily with the best known people that visit New York during the gay winter season.

Probably no moving picture that has ever been produced has awakened more interest among the theater-going public than this unique offering.

OPENING DATES FOR "ANTONY AND CLEOPATRA."

"Antony and Cleopatra" will open almost simultaneously in practically all the big cities of the United States. Bookings have been arranged for the Savoy Theater, San Francisco, January 5th; Moore Theater, Seattle, January 5th; Majestic Theater, Buffalo, January 19th; Hartman Theater, Columbus, Ohio, January 12th; The Valentine Theater, Dayton, Ohio, January 22nd; The Vendome Theater, Nashville, Tenn., January 12th; Fairbank's Theater, Springfield, Ohio, February 2nd; Court Theater, Wheeling, W. Va., February 9th; The Valentine Theater, Toledo, Ohio, February 26th; Lyceum Theater, Memphis, Tenn., February 18th; Savannah Theater, Savannah, Ga., February 4th; Atlanta Theater, Atlanta, Ga., February 9th; His Majesty's Theater, Montreal, February 16th; The Broadway Theater, Detroit, Mich., February 18th, and the English Opera House, Indianapolis, February 15th. Many requests have been received from New York theatrical houses for a New York opening, but Kleine has decided to hold this beautiful production for opening in his own theater on 42nd Street, near Broadway, which is expected to be completed in February.

"CALAMITY ANNE IN SOCIETY" (American).

Louise Lester, in her inimitable character sketch of "Calamity Anne," goes herself one better than in her last appearance of "Calamity Anne's Dream." Her acting is perfectly natural, so much so, in fact, that one would almost believe her to be the novice in society dress she purports to be. Her appearance is decidedly grotesque and will provoke wholesome amusement and attests her astounding versatility. Release of this subject has been set for January 31st.

MOORE AND COOLEY JOIN RELIANCE.

Owen Moore and James Cooley, two of the best known motion picture leading men in the art, have become identified with Reliance during the past week. Mr. Moore and Mr. Cooley will be seen in the D. W. Griffith four reel production of "The Escape," by Paul Armstrong, which is now being prepared for picture presentation.

GREGORY MAKING "PRINCESS" BRAND.

With Princess brand, Carl Louis Gregory, former chief photographer for Thanhouser Film Corporation, is making pictures that are making good, and, aided by clever heart-interest stories with human appeal, Miss Muriel Ostriche, Boyd Marshall, Miss Marie Eline, Arthur Baur, Morgan Jones, Miss Fanny Burks, Miss Fanny Gregory, Carey Hastings and other excellent portrayers of the silent drama, Mr. Gregory's entrance into the directing end is meeting with excellent results. Mr. Gregory is doing his own camera work, scenario revision and directing, and is aided by Claud Seixas as assistant. Mr. Gregory's knowledge of tone and color harmony is perhaps responsible for the wonderful effects he gains in creations like "His Imaginary Family," and excellent nature studies with outside locations. He has gone from the farce production to drama with the release on December 19 of "The Law of Humanity," commented upon in the Moving Picture World of January 3, balancing his program with polite comedy dramas. John W. Kellette, of New Rochelle, N. Y., is writing the majority of the scripts.

THE RUBY FEATURE STUDIO.

Occupies Spacious Quarters Admirably Adapted to the Uses of Picture Making.

Another motion picture studio has been opened in New York City. It is owned by the Ruby Feature Film Company and is located at 217 East 24th Street, and is quite convenient of access. The promoter and principal owner of the company, Leon J. Rubinstein, has had considerable experience in the work of making pictures and, being compelled in the beginning to rent other studios, he has been able, in the building of his own, to profit by the mistakes and the good points in studio construction made by others.

The Twinplex Plan Studios.

Two floors are occupied by the Ruby studio having a total of 17,000 square feet in floor space. The first floor is occupied by the business offices of the company, the carpenter and scene painting departments, a projection room and shipping department. On the floor above is the studio proper, shower baths and a restaurant with cooking appliances and accommodations for fully 100 persons. This feature will prove a great convenience to the players.

A glass roof over more than one-third of the studio area provides ample natural light and artificial light is furnished by two banks of Cooper-Hewitt improved lights and two batteries of arc lights hung from moveable conveyors that can be swung to either side of the studio, making it possible for the stage director to strike and raise sets on one side of the studio while the players are busy with the making of another scene on the other side. This is a feature that is being incorporated in all the newer studios.

Mr. Rubinstein has a number of pictures under way and the new studio is already a place of considerable activity.

AMERICAN TO DRAMATIZE DICKENS' STORY.

Charles Dickens' popular story "The Cricket on the Hearth," will be produced in pictures by Lorimer Johnston. The subject will be presented in two parts in a novel and original manner. Elaborate and extensive preparations are being completed to make this subject one of the strongest features for the new year.

"THE MARRIAGE OF FIGARO" (Ambrosio).

The cut herewith illustrates a beautiful scene from the remarkably beautiful Kleine-Ambrosio release in two parts, "The Marriage of Figaro," for release Tuesday, February 3rd, 1914. This is an Ambrosio version of the Rossini opera story, and is noteworthy for its magnificent photography and some magnificent settings, both interior and exterior. Alcazar, the Royal Palace at Seville, Spain, was used by special permission from King Alfonso.

Scene from "The Marriage of Figaro" (Kleine-Ambrosio).

In order to further enhance the artistic effects of this production, George Kleine has caused the preparation of special music and has imported from Italy some especially beautiful 8-sheets, which will be sold at an extremely reasonable figure to theaters and exchanges desiring to add them to the regular 1, 3, and 6-sheet of domestic manufacture.

GAUNTIER PLAYERS' NOTES.

Raymond Schrock, a scenario author of prominence, has joined the Gene Gauntier Players in the capacity of scenario editor and studio manager. He hails from Goshen, Ind., and arrived this week full of enthusiasm and anxious to meet his new associates in a business and social way. In the future, all communications to the studio and scenario department of the Gene Gauntier Feature Players should be addressed to him.

The next release of the Gene Gauntier Feature Players will be the week of January 18th. It is a story of New York life and is entitled "Through the Fires of Temptation." Mr. Jack J. Clark produced the picture and Miss Gauntier wrote the scenario, which is a sufficient guarantee that it will be above the standard of ordinary productions and be appreciated by all classes of people.

Miss Gene Gauntier has been very ill for the past ten days, having worked too hard upon recent releases in order to please her many admirers. She hopes to be out soon and will be back before the screen just as soon as her health permits.

REALISTIC WAR PICTURES.

Mr. Robert Schwobthaler, formerly a member of the firm, Raleigh & Robert, and now one of the owners of the Express Films Company, of Freiburg, Germany, has just arrived from Paris and has taken rooms at the Hotel Belmont. Mr. Schwobthaler had been commissioned by the Greek government to take pictures in the late conflict between Greece and Bulgaria. With an assistant, he has been in the midst of the war for six weeks enduring innumerable hardships and braving many perils. His passport allowed him to come up to the very firing lines and he made ample use of this permission. He took in all, four thousand feet of realistic war pictures.

By invitation he showed the pictures to a distinguished audience at the armory of the Seventy-first Regiment, lecturing on the pictures as they passed on the screen. The pictures have been sold to a Greek-American syndicate which has acquired the rights of exhibition in the United States and Canada.

SHERRY GETS LASKY PICTURES FOR NEW YORK.

William L. Sherry, president of the Wm. L. Sherry Feature Film Company, handling the sole output of the Famous Players Company, this week contracted for the entire output of the Jesse Lasky Feature Film Company for New York State.

This is the first contract made by the Sherry people with the exception of the Famous Players contract. Mr. Sherry long ago decided that he would not handle films not measuring up to a certain standard he had set. After seeing a portion of the Lasky first release, he immediately purchased the New York state rights for the first year's releases, of which there will be ten.

Sherry will make his first Lasky releases shortly after February 15, when the "Squaw Man," with Dustin Farnum, will be released.

"THE SHADOW OF GUILT" (Kalem).

This is a powerful two-part feature with a strong story cleverly told. The characterization in the feature is particularly good, some of the most famous and accomplished Kalem stars taking part. The story takes its rise in the financial world. An unfortunate speculation brings about the ruin of a broker and his creditor is relentless to the point of cruelty. Death follows misfortune. The successful man, feeling remorse, hires the son of the dead man for his private secretary. The latter proves a villain and manages to get his employer into his toils, alienating him even from his closest relatives. In the end virtue triumphs and the villain gets his just deserts.

COBB BOOSTING RAMO.

Upon his recent western trip for Ramo films, C. Lang Cobb, who handles the sales and publicity for that company, succeeded in introducing his pictures in very productive territory. Joe Hopp's new Union Film Company, of Chicago, will handle Ramos in his territory; the Edwards-Zetler Feature Film Company, of Dayton, Ohio, will distribute them in that state, and the Peerless Film and Supply Company, of Indianapolis, Ind., has an exclusive contract for Indiana and Kentucky. Contracts for individual features were made for several states.

Mr. Cobb also announces that he has closed an important contract with William Fox, who will take three prints of all Ramo pictures for New York, New England and Northern Jersey.

"A MODEL YOUNG MAN" (Vitagraph).

Sidney Drew will soon appear in the comedy, "A Model Young Man," one he has presented and performed in before theater audiences in nearly every part of the world. It has been reconstructed for moving pictures and will be produced in the usual Vitagraph style, and making it one of the most laughable comedies of the year. The original play was written by Jacques Feutrelle, the celebrated short-story writer, who lost his life on the Titanic. Mr. Drew has become in moving pictures a model comedian who has individuality of expression, which has proven a revelation in the subtlety of the art of naturalness so essential to the silent drama.

"THE ROSE OF YESTERYEAR" (Warner's Features).

Surpassingly beautiful, as powerfully dramatic as anything Miss Leonard has ever done, this unusual Warner's Feature will add new laurels to Miss Leonard's fame as a finished actress of the silent drama. So well portrayed, so convincingly real are the characters that move through the story, that the observer will realize he is seeing one of those every day tragedies of life, which after all make the best dramas. It is in three parts.

BALBOA AMUSEMENT PRODUCING CO.

At the time the Edison Company gave up their studio at Long Beach the Horkheimer Brothers, E. D. and H. M., were in California looking over the field for an opportunity to start a motion picture company. The old Edison studio was leased, directors, camera men, leading men and women were at once engaged and the newly formed company started to produce pictures. A few weeks ago it was found necessary to add to the studio, so new stages were built and everything made ready for the feature films which the Balboa Company will produce during the year.

"COPPER MINING AT THE CALUMET AND HECLA."

"Copper Mining at the Calumet and Hecla," a two-reel feature, will be released shortly. This big feature consists of pictures taken 8,000 feet down in the earth, and was photographed by the Industrial Moving Picture Company of Chicago.

"KISSING CUP" DRAWING WELL.

Albert Blinkhorn's four-part feature, "Kissing Cup," is playing to crowded houses throughout the country. The Empress Feature Film Company, which has bought this production for Ohio, Indiana and Kentucky, finds that, in order to satisfy the demand for it, it must have another copy and have ordered one from Blinkhorn's Film Agency, 110 West 40th Street, New York. Many buyers have found out the same thing and have ordered additional copies.

HARRY LAUDER IN MOTION PICTURES.

The first motion picture ever taken of Harry Lauder, the great Scotch comedian, who has just started his sixth tour of America, under the direction of William Morris, will soon arrive in America. It is a thousand-foot subject showing the famous Scotchman and Neil Kenyon, his only rival in his line, now playing at the Colonial at a huge salary, in a comedy golf match taken less than a month ago at Wembley Park, near London.

Harry Lauder and Neil Kenyon in Comedy Golf Match.

The picture will soon be brought to America by James McEnnery, the young Englishman who sold "A Message from Mars" in this country. He is now in London, but will soon start for New York with the pictures, which are being rapidly completed, and will sell state rights. The fact that this is the only picture ever taken of Lauder, and it shows with him Neil Kenyon, his present rival for comedy honors in America, should make it a ready seller in America, especially now when he is just starting his world tour.

CHAPTER I.

UNDER a canopied platform stood a young girl, modeling in clay. The glare of the California sunshine, filtering through the canvas, became mellowed, warm, and golden. Above the girl's head—yellow like the stalk of wheat—there hovered a kind of aureola, as if there had risen above it a haze of impalpable gold dust.

A poet I know might have cried out that here ended his quest of the Golden Girl. Straight she stood at this moment, lovely of face, rounded of form, with an indescribable suggestion of latent physical power or magnetism. On her temples were little daubs of clay, caused doubtless by impatient fingers sweeping back occasional wind blown locks of hair. There was even a daub on the side of her handsome, sensitive nose.

Her hand still filled with clay, dropped to her side, and a tableau endured for a minute or two, suggesting a remote period, a Persian idyl, mayhap. With a smile on her lips she stared

IN THE MIDDLE WEST.

The new Citizens Board of Moving Picture Censors of Milwaukee, Wis., has decided that it will not make a promiscuous inspection of films. They will inspect only such films as have not been passed by the National Board of Censorship. The request for the censorship must come from the exhibitor. If he shows an unpassed picture his license may be revoked by the mayor. Thus the task of weeding out the bad pictures is put directly up to the theater owner. A fee of seventy-five cents is charged for each inspection. There will be no questioning of the pictures passed by the National Board.

The Social Service Board of Omaha, Neb., in a report to the city council, has urged local inspection of all moving picture films before they are exhibited in the city. It further urges an increase of administrative authority and discretion in the moral regulation of amusements, giving power to suspend or revoke licenses for moral offense, with no court review, save on the ground of reasonableness.

GOLDSMITH.

PHILADELPHIA.

UNSEASONABLE weather has caused a somewhat lethargic condition of affairs in the moving picture industry of Philadelphia during the past few weeks, with the exhibitors feeling the real blunt of the dull business.

Summarized, the photoplay industry in the Quaker City for the year just past has been quite satisfactory. More theaters have been opened during 1913 than in any other year, and the number of film exchanges has more than doubled. Of course a number of "fly-by-night" concerns have opened up one day and vanished the next, but it is now believed that those doing business in Philadelphia are here to stay, and will become a big factor in assisting the exhibitor to give their patrons the very best show possible.

Lewis M. Swaab is now comfortably located in his new building at 1327 Vine Street, a location which is right in the heart of the moving picture colony of Philadelphia. In the new quarters every device for handling business quickly is afforded, and the stock, which includes everything the exhibitor may want, is as complete as it is possible to make it.

The S. & S. Film Manufacturing Co., of Wilmington, Del., has been incorporated under the laws of Delaware with a capital of $1,000,000. George W. Dillman is the principal incorporator.

The theater is fireproof and furnished throughout in a most up-to-date manner. CLEVELAND'S first motion picture manufacturing concern is solidly on its feet, according to S. A. Lustig, president of the Columbia Film Manufacturing Company, Columbia building. Mr. Lustig has not taken up the production of photoplays, but is prepared to do all kinds of commercial work and make outdoor pictures for any purpose. He is filming all important events in the city and has made many trips to the towns adjoining Cleveland. Mr. Lustig is building up a library of Cleveland subjects that will grow in value with the years. Many prominent men and women and scenes that may never be produced have been caught by his camera. It is getting to be a fad for families to have a private picture taken showing the children at play or scenes about their homes. Mr. Lustig has made private films for some of Cleveland's best families.

Three reels of film were shown at the M. E. Church, at Bellefontaine, O., as a part of the Christmas eve entertainment.

For the convenience of persons whose names appear in the classified columns of the contest being conducted by the Newark Advocate that Newark, O., paper has arranged that winners present their coupons to the box office of the Orpheum Theater, to register entrance into the theater.

Youngstown is to have a new vaudeville and motion picture house, according to the word going through the agencies. The old Callahan hotel is the proposed site of the new enterprise and it is planned to have a sort of arcade from Federal Street back to the building. The Federal Street merchants interested are said to be in favor of the scheme, as it will give them a fine arcade for display.

Manager Wright, of the Royal and Victory Theaters, threw open the doors of his houses to the children of Findlay as his special guests as a Christmas treat.

Heavy patronage at the Star Theater, Sandusky, attests the wide following enjoyed by Mr. and Mrs. John D. Kessler, proprietors of the pretty little picture house.

The Greenville Opera House, Greenville, O., which has been leased by Fall Bros., has recently undergone repairs and a general overhauling, just reopening as a vaudeville and motion picture house. A new Power's 6-A machine has been installed in an asbestos booth. The theater is under the management of C. E. Ballard, who guarantees the best motion pictures obtainable. Four reels will be shown each day.

The Alhambra Theater, at East 105th Street and Euclid Avenue, Cleveland, has determined on a policy of high-class pictures and no vaudeville. The house has a big organ, which is used during the run of pictures and there is also a capable orchestra.

The Knickerbocker, on Euclid Avenue, Cleveland, is planning many surprises for its patrons during the next year. A large number of feature photoplays will be produced.

Safety Director Dunwoodie stopped the run of "Dante's Inferno" at the Orpheum Theater in Canton, O., recently, in spite of the fact that the film passed the National Board of Censorship.

Manager Downs, of the Knickerbocker Theater, Euclid Avenue, Cleveland, says he is a specialist in judging moving pictures, and claims to have set the pace in giving the public the big productions. He announces for the coming year: Carlotta Nillson in "Leah Kleschna," Helen Gardner in "A Princess of Bagdad," Cecelia Loftus in "A Lady of Quality," Thomas W. Ross in "Checkers," Dustin Farnum in "A Soldier of Fortune," and all the productions starring Mary Pickford.

Phil Chakeras is having great success with his new picture house, the Majestic, at Springfield, and his untiring efforts have brought him a following that is enviable to say the least.

Louis J. Becht, proprietor of the Mall Theater, which is located just across the street from the city hall in Cleveland, has just stolen a march on his old friend, Mayor Baker. Mayor Baker went to Pottsville, Pa., for the holidays, and the day after his departure Mr. Becht had the front of his theater highly decorated with posters of the "Celebrated Petrosini films." One year ago, these same posters, advertising the same film, caused Mayor Baker to start a crusade, for looking out his front window one bright morning, he spied the posters, and as it was during a period of alleged "crime wave" in Cleveland, called up the then Police Chief Kohler and had the posters taken down. So Becht had his Petrosini film examined by the state board of censorship and it was passed. He didn't lose much time putting it on the screen, thereby securing the last laugh.

A. P. Anthony put on a show for the Graham Brothers at the Grays' Armory, Cleveland, December 28, with a special program of Irish pictures. Graham Brothers imported eight reels of film made in Ireland and of special interest to Irish people. The orphans of Cleveland were entertained at Elks' hall December 29, when the Irish films were thrown upon the screen in the big auditorium.

A picture shown at the Knickerbocker Theater, Cleveland, won the Cleveland Plain Dealer's contest in the selection of the "best" picture. Miss Lucy Fouts, 7516 Linwood Avenue, submitted the letter considered "best" and was awarded a five-dollar prize. She maintained "The Wheels of Fate" was of greatest interest and her two hundred word letter explained that the quick action of the film prompted her decision.

Earle Williams, starring in certain Vitagraph films, made the acquaintance of many patrons of the Dome Theater, at Youngstown, when he appeared there recently.

"BUCKEYE."

INDIANA.

THE Terre Haute Film Co., Terre Haute, Ind., has incorporated with a capital stock of $5,000, and the following directors: Elias B. Sheets, Alice H. Sheets and Samuel J. Weinstein. The plans of the company are not known.

The barker at the Gem Theater, Indianapolis, when the attraction was the Pathe film, "A Slave of Satan," was crying it as "a devil of a good show."

Secretary A. C. Zaring, of the Indiana Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association, is expected at his office the coming week. He has been ill of typhoid fever. A number of matters of interest to exhibitors all over the state await his return. He is expected to take a hand in formulating some plans for the meeting of the association in Evansville the latter part of January.

Though out of the downtown section several miles, the Garrick Theater, Indianapolis, believes in advertising. The house is one of the best patronized in the city, and is one of the few neighborhood houses where a matinee pays.

One comic and one educational is the rule at the Grand Central, Indianapolis.

William Huddy, owner of the New Riverside Theatorium, is enjoying a big success, according to his report of the way people have attended his shows.

The New Starland Theater, Anderson, Ind., was opened to tremendous crowds Christmas Day. The house was built by John R. Roseberry and Joseph Faulknor at a cost of $25,000. The house is one of the handsomest in the Middle West devoted to the movies. It seats 547 and two baby grand pianos and a pipe organ that cost $5,000 are part of the equipment. Mr. Faulknor will have the management of the theater. Two singers are used as additional attractions, and the shows run four reels.

Harry Crigler, who ran a movie house at Oxford, Ind., is now musical conductor for the Gentry Dog and Pony Show. Crigler says that usually men go from the circus business to the motion picture business instead of the other way around as he has done.

The Irving is the name of the new theater at Irvington, a suburb of Indianapolis. The house was recently opened by H. L. Whitehead, who offered a prize of $10 at the first performance for the person who would suggest a name for the house. A committee of prominent citizens of the suburb decided the contest, and awarded a prize of $10.

The Auditorium Theater, Connersville, Ind., has opened under the management of C. C. Zuber. Zuber is using Kalem features. Three pianos were used the opening night. It is a five and ten cent house.

"Daily papers always carry my program," is the flash used by the Arc Theater, Crawfordsville, Ind. This is one way of making patrons watch for your advertising.

Joe Bertotti, proprietor of the Columbia Theater, Clinton, Ind., is featuring a boy tenor at each performance.

Indianapolis theaters have quit using vaudeville attractions. They are depending upon the pictures to do the entertaining. Pianists and drummers still are used, however. Once in a while some artist "running wild," is given a chance to do something to pay for his cakes. J. M. Rhodes, president of the Indiana Exhibitors' League, is known as the friend of the "wild" ones.

Now the women of Lawrenceburg, Ind., have decided that the movies need censoring. The women of the churches will organize a censor board. Up with the lorgnettes and at them!

The Talbott Theater, Indianapolis, prints its programs for a week in advance, a change nightly, with special features Tuesday, Friday and Sunday. The printing of a movie house program for a week in advance is some stunt in Indianapolis, and incidentally Manager Schnitzer says it is bringing them back.

M. C. Farrell, who is to manage the new Victoria, Hudson and Sixteenth street, Indianapolis, will use the Snitzer program idea when he opens, January 15. Farrell says his programs will carry no advertising. He is not indifferent to the kale, just anxious not to offend a rather select neighborhood.

Business in the Indiana movie houses has taken a big jump since Christmas. President J. M. Rhodes seems to be of the opinion that exhibitors of the state contributed very largely to the increased stock of sunburst neckties now abroad.

The Vaudette Theater has added the Gaumont features to its service. The Vaudette was one of the first houses in Indianapolis. Turning in to kill time with Manager Smith, of the Vaudette, has become an Indianapolis habit.

Oran Calvert, Franklin, Ind., is a convert to Kalem features. Ed. Bingham, of the Empress Feature Film Company, started him with "From the Manger to the Cross."

The Starland, C. N. Stevenson's new theater in Indianapolis, is doing a good business. The house has a Rembusch mirror screen.

Manager A. C. Zaring, of the North Star Theater, Indianapolis, and secretary of the Indiana Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association, is able to be about again after a long siege with typhoid fever. One of Zaring's first tasks is to get things in motion for the semi-annual meeting of the Association, at Evansville, this month.

Manager Frank, of the Grand at Macomb, has installed a Standard piano player with flute and harp attachment.

Mr. and Mrs. C. Plein, of the Family Theater at Dixon, gave away 1,000 tickets to the Good Fellows of that city to be distributed where they would do the most good at Christmas time. This spirit was very apparent this year. Manager W. W. Watts, of the Vaudette at Springfield, put on a special show for the kiddies on Christmas day. The program at the "B" at Aurora had a juvenile tinge and in addition the house was favored by a visit from Santa Claus. Manager Tilford, of the Star at Murphysboro, put on a free matinee for the youngsters. Circuit Judge Harry Higbee, of Pittsfield, was the host at the free matinee at the Knights of Pythias opera house in that city, but the hand of Manager Burr Swan was in evidence in the selection of the program. Six reels were given at Swan's Christmas night show. Incidentally, the feeling of having made somebody happy was a nice thing for the Illinois managers to think of, because many of them did a very poor holiday business. The blizzardy day kept the people in by their firesides.

Mrs. P. A. Harvey is pianist at the Lyric Theater in Villa Grove in the place of Miss Bertha Armstrong, who is unable to resume her duties following an illness.

He recommended, however, that provision be made for a city license for operators at a nominal fee.

Al. Lewis opened his new moving picture theater at Sandoval with a free show. The house will be opened each night except Sunday. This gives Sandoval two photoplay theaters.

C. D. Caster has sold his moving picture theater at Chenoa to A. M. Blake.

D. J. Kimmell, who purchased the Pyric Theater at Pana last summer, has sold the house to W. B. Johnson, of Glasgow, Ky., who has assumed charge.

The American Theater at East St. Louis, which is now under the management of H. N. Morgan, has plenty of stunts to keep the house force busy. For one thing announcement is made that an upright piano will be given away every month. Other things in the gift line include two grand prizes each Monday night, souvenirs to the women every Tuesday and Friday. Souvenirs, it is announced, have taken the place of Eagle Stamps. The stamp evil is much in evidence in East St. Louis houses, however. Another feature of the American's is the invitation "Bring the babies, we'll take care of them."

Dreamland Theater at Roodhouse is conducting a baby show contest.

The Knights of Pythias room at Sidney has been rented by Dahl & Epperson, who will occupy it with their moving picture show.

Manager William Q. Setliffe, of the Grand Opera House at Mattoon, has turned his place into a vaudeville house.

It provides for no standing room, no perpendicular rises on floors, no grades of more than one foot in ten, main exit ten feet wide, no exits less than five feet wide, seats thirty-two inches, back to back and not more than ten in a string. The city electrician is to examine the operators, and weekly inspections will be made by the fire marshal and city electrician.

N. H. Gibbons, owner of the Aurora and Grand Theaters at Lawrence, Kan., has recently pleaded guilty to the charge of permitting persons to stand in the aisles and lobbies and was fined $25.50.

Manager F. W. Peters, of the Queen, at Houston, Tex., planned to open the new house the evening of December 24. In the afternoon a complimentary pipe organ recital was given by William Street and J. J. Blood, both of London, England. E. W. Hulsey is owner of the theater.

P. W. Horn, superintendent of the city schools of Houston, Texas, before a meeting of the Parent-Teachers Association of that city, gave a strong indorsement of moving pictures for educational purposes. He does not believe, however, that textbooks will be entirely supplanted by films. The Rusk school already has installed projecting apparatus.

Herman Fichtenberg, head of the Fichtenberg moving picture enterprises, and his general manager, W. H. Gueringer, who were in Houston, Texas, at the opening of the new Queen, are said to have hinted that another photoplay house might be erected in that city. A notable feature of the opening of the Queen was that addresses were made by the mayors of two cities, Campbell, of Houston, and Fisher, of Galveston. "Moving pictures are the greatest educators of the present era," said Mayor Campbell. "This beautiful theater is one of which any city ought to be proud."

IN THE NORTHWEST.

AN extensive paper on "The Future of the Moving Picture" was read before the Social Science Club at Aberdeen, S. Dak., by C. T. Smithers. He had made considerable research along the lines of the advantages of the moving picture in educational and religious work and quoted many noted divines who favored the thoughtful use of films. The successful plan of Park Church, in Grand Rapids, Mich., which rejuvenated a dying church organization by its pleasant Sunday after-

A FOREWORD

You can fool all exhibitors some of the time, you can fool some exhibitors all of the time, but you cannot fool all of the exhibitors all of the time.

Sounds cryptic, eh?

Well, buy for your territory while you have the chance. There will be no mystery in the meaning then.

Buffalo News

"THE THIRD DEGREE" A "MOVIE" MASTERPIECE.

Famous Charles Klein Drama to Be Shown to Buffalonians —The Climax of All Moving Picture Films

The last word in modern motion picture photography! That is perhaps a rash statement to make when there are so many wonderful films on the market, but the words hardly do justice to the film which is about to be presented to Buffalo's moving picture enthusiasts. The other day in one of Buffalo's leading theaters a film was thrown upon the screen for the approval or disapproval of the managers of the local theaters. That film was Charles Klein's masterpiece, "The Third Degree." It ran an hour and a quarter, but during that entire time not a sound was heard from the audience, which was composed of men who "knew" what was good and what was bad in the "movie" world. That silence portended "something" when the play was ended. That "something" came in a burst of applause and afterwards expressions such as "Wonderful!" "At last we have a real film!" "Great!" and so on.

And now that the managers have put their stamp of approval

The Third Degree (5 Reels) is a record-smashing success, because of its splendid Lubin photography, its great popularity and fame as a drama, and the wonderful scope of its appeal. The story is graphic and thrilling, has a lofty moral—is fine in technique, tense in plot and worked out with the skill and cunning of the foremost playwright of the day—Charles Klein. The Third Degree pleases every class of picture fan. Write for bookings to rooms, in which the motion picture industry played the leading part, was given in detail. He also viewed the motion picture from a sociological standpoint and saw great value in its appeal to the family group. One of the most significant phases was apparent when he championed the picture show as "the ally of the sober life," the most effective substitute for the saloon.

Arnold Johnson has sold his half interest in the Cokato Motion Picture Company at Cokato, Minn., to William A. Donahue.

The moving picture show of J. S. Leary, at Portal, N. Dak., has been sold to Tony and Otto Wagner, who also will operate a show at Bowbells.

A new moving picture show will be opened at Mabel, Minn., by Doctor Harrington, of Preston, Minn.

The West Central Minnesota Development Association has decided to adopt the moving picture machine to illustrate modern agricultural methods and to show life in foreign countries. Projecting apparatus will be purchased for each county which is in the territory of the association and will be in charge of the county agent. Slides will be used for local subjects. In the summer illustrated lectures will be given outdoors, but in the winter time the school houses will be used.

Al Gernes, of Rochester, Minn., has engaged in the moving picture business at Lake City, Minn.

J. L. Beck will be the manager of the moving picture show opened in Brown's Opera House at Alexandria, Minn.

The Seville Theater at Minneapolis, Minn., has installed a new Wurlitzer concert orchestra with chimes, bells and xylophones.

Leo Perkins has sold the Wonderland Theater at Windom, Minn., to Marcus Lohse, of Heron Lake.

The Lund building at Aurora, Minn., has been leased by E. T. Sandberg, who will remodel it to be used as a moving picture theater.

Charles I. Pelto is reported to be contemplating opening a moving picture theater at Two Harbors, Minn.

Rev. E. C. Hickman, progressive pastor of the Methodist Church at Byron, Minn., has installed a moving picture machine in his church. Other achievements for this minister include the organization of a village band and church orchestra, and a movement for a co-operative creamery and laundry for the farmers.

A notice denouncing the plan to establish a motion picture theater near the Irving school on Grand Avenue, in Minneapolis, Minn., was sent broadcast by Mrs. C. D. Maclaren, president of the Irving School District Association. The protest also was filed with the Board of Aldermen.

Prof. F. H. Swift, of the history department of the University of Minnesota, who at a recent meeting of the International Purity Congress urged thorough censorship of amusements, prepared for the Woman's Welfare League of Minneapolis a draft of an ordinance for presentation to the Committee on Recreation and Amusements of the City Council. The measure is not aimed directly at moving pictures because Professor Swift has given approval of many houses. Burlesque shows, vaudeville houses and dance halls have not been so well conducted. Among the changes desired are censorship by some city official of all films prior to their presentation; lighted auditoriums during moving picture performances; exclusion from all places of amusement, whether accompanied by parents or not of all children under 16 years of age after 10 p. m., and of all children under 12 after 9 p. m.; sanitation in all amusement places; licenses to be issued to theaters and not to persons conducting them, and censorship of posters and advertising. That the Welfare League is not opposed to pictures is evident. All Christmas week it presented at the First Baptist Church the Kalem picture "From the Manger to the Cross" and urged all young people's organizations to secure blocks of seats and attend.

As a result of a visit to Chicago, where she heard the lectures given by Dr. Maria Montressori, Miss Elizabeth Hall, assistant superintendent of Minneapolis, Minn., decided to recommend that motion pictures be made of the primary grade pupils at work in the Minneapolis schools.

J. C. and G. W. H. Ryceman, of Woonsocket, have purchased the moving picture theater at Scotland, S. D., from A. L. Jones.

The Woman's Welfare League of Minneapolis, Minn., found patronage so good for "From the Manger to the Cross" holiday week, that the exhibition was shifted from First Baptist church to the Lyric Theater, the use of the latter house being donated by the management.

Mrs. Jennie Tresham, at one time with Minnie Maddern Fiske, and previously with Joseph Jefferson in "Rip Van Winkle," but more recently with a Portland, Ore., moving picture company, died recently at Spokane, Wash., where she had gone to take a rest.

H. W. Kelley will open a moving picture show at Jamestown, N. D.

State officials have installed a Power's 6A in the hospital for the insane at Rochester, and performances will be given once each week.

Mayor Wallace G. Nye, of Minneapolis, Minn., has warned moving picture theater proprietors that unless sugestions as to safety made after inspections by city officials are heeded, their licenses will be revoked.

W. C. Kenzel has engaged in the moving picture business at Mandan, N. D.

James W. Waters has sold his interest in the Star moving picture theater at Lemmon, S. D., to A. H. Clark.

Manager Jones, of the Star Theater at Lincoln, was recently host to an unusual crowd of little folk. They were 200 children from the Lincoln State School and Colony (for feeble-minded and epileptics). It was in the nature of a holiday treat.

The consent ordinance has been passed by the Rock Island city council, and in the future it will be necessary to secure permission from property-owners two hundred feet each way from the proposed site, before a new moving picture theater can be opened.

Manager Samuel Bates, of the Bijou at Kewanee, has closed the house and the re-opening is uncertain. Lack of attendance is given as the reason. The house has been operated in a first-class manner, but the field seems to have been crowded.

Thomas Ronon, manager of Powers Theater at Decatur, has entered the photoplay field and will run pictures when he has no theatrical attractions. He has made a contract with the Swanson-Crawford Film Company, of St. Louis, for service. Two cabaret singers are announced as extra attractions between the pictures.

The opening of the new Orpheum Theater, Bradley's moving picture house, assumed the importance of a civic event December 29. Mayor Hoehn presided and an address was made by City Attorney Frank J. Burns. The building, which is 100 x 25, was erected at a cost of $10,000 and has everything that it is justified in giving a small city a thoroughly modern photoplay house. Art Baldwin is operator.

The new Princess Theater at Watseka, which was opened January 1 by Manager Kendall, has a seating capacity of 250. Special features will be shown once each week.

Tewksbury & Black have purchased the Grand Opera House Building at Bluffs from E. D. Bierd. New plans for the amusement end of the building have not been made.

Exits blockaded by advertising signs and, in one house four out of six exits kept locked, are among the striking features of a report made by Deputy State Fire Marshal Harper and City Chief George W. Newberry, at Rock Island, after an inspection of the theaters of that city.

William Blankenship, who is to engage in the motion picture business at Carrollton, gives up the position of city marshal for that purpose.

The Canton Leader is opposed to the "White Slave" films. "Canton is fortunate in the character of picture houses, which are operated here. They do not need these 'moral clinics' to get business."

With the exception of one or two evenings a week when road shows will be played, the Grand Opera House, at Rockford, after January 7, becomes a five-cent moving picture house. Manager Grampp adopted the plan which he successfully used in Joliet. The Famous Players' pictures, which have been run three days a week, are discontinued and four reels, daily, of Mutual films have been substituted.

The employers of the Princess Theater at Galesburg, were recently the guests of the employees at a little supper. Following the spread, talks on the past, present and future of the house were made.

The New Year policy of the Star Theater at Aurora is to continue its regular five-cent show, Friday, Saturday and Sundays, but one Mondays, Tuesdays, Wednesdays and Thursdays to offer the big multiple reel features at ten cents.

The new South State street moving picture show has been opened at Ridge Farm.

When the Decatur Herald set out to impress upon its readers with a booster edition the progress made in the last year it deemed the rapid strides of the moving picture to exhibitors worthy a red-full-page banner line. Pictures of the Paris, Oakland and Crescent illustrated the article. This recognition of the photoplay as an industrial factor was marked in all the reviews made by Illinois papers this year.

PITTSBURG.

THE new theater to be erected in East Liberty by Rowland & Clark, is designed to be the handsomest house in Pittsburgh. The theater will be located on Penn avenue, just north of Highland avenue. A long foyer will run to the rear of Kirkwood street, where the theater proper will be built. The house will seat 1,000, and will have a large balcony. While intended exclusively for moving pictures, a large stage is to be built, so that other entertainments may be put on also.

At a meeting in Harrisburg of the Men's Christian Association, an organization that has as its object the increasing of church attendance, Bishop James Henry Darlington, of the Protestant church, praised the motion picture theater. "Some ministers and others are opposed to moving pictures," the bishop said, "but I am not. The moving picture theater is one of the greatest educational forces we have. It provides the poor man with badly needed recreation, and is one of the greatest foes of the saloon." The audience of over 400, broke out in loud applause at the bishop's address.

The Dreamland moving picture theater, at Natrona, will be considerably improved in the near future. Manager John Sweitzer will have the entire interior redecorated and new equipment added. Two large cluster electric lights will be placed outside the theater, and a large poster board built for the display of the program.

Several of the Pittsburgh motion picture houses have been hit by the new child and female labor laws which went into effect in this state last month. A branch of the state department of inspection has been established here, and with a large force of deputies, Inspector Feehan is rigidly enforcing the new laws. The provisions in the new laws prohibit any girl under 21 from working after nine o'clock at night. Boys under 16 may not work after this hour. As a result several of the local theaters have been compelled to secure new ticket sellers and ushers. Before this was done, however, thirteen of the Pittsburgh theater managers were made defendants in a suit brought against them by the state for violation of the labor laws.

M. J. Gibbons, proprietor of the Nixon moving picture theater, of New Castle, was the winner of a five-passenger Oakland touring car in a contest held by the Pittsburgh Post in gaining new subscriptions. Mr. Gibbons collected over three million votes and was an easy winner. He received the automobile in time for Christmas, and is proudly displaying it to his friends.

During Christmas week the downtown theaters raised the price of admission to ten cents on Saturday, and on the actual holidays. The houses were crowded at each performance.

A school for motion picture machine operators has been opened in the Cameraphone Building, on Fifth avenue.

D. L. MANLEY.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

SMITH BROS. have had plans prepared for the erection of a moving picture theater at 2100 Fourteenth street, Northwest. The building will measure 20 by 150 feet and will cost approximately $6,000 when completed.

It is reported that there has been formed in this city an organization whose membership is made up of men and women who have had photoplays rejected. Every one who has ever written a motion picture scenario and has had it refused by any of the big film concerns is eligible for membership in the Inquest Circle of Motion Picture World, and there are no fees of any kind. The object of the circle is to have disappointed authors of photoplays meet and condole with one another.

The United States Government, it is reported, will seek to escape the task of censoring films imported into this country, as required by the new tariff law, and will endeavor to make a working agreement with the various other censorship boards. Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Hamlin is now at work on the department regulations regarding films which must be published before the tariff law's provisions go into effect.

Among the latest additions to the moving picture field in this city is the American Theater, on Rhode Island avenue, near First street, Northwest. It has a seating capacity of 750 and is modern in every respect. The American is another of the chain of theaters operated by Tom Moore and will run the same pictures as are shown at the Garden.

William Alvine, manager of the Virginia Theater, on Ninth street, was given a very acceptable Christmas gift by John J. Noonan, proprietor of the theater, in the shape of a trip to New York and Atlantic City for himself and Mrs. Alvine.

The country at large will soon have an opportunity of seeing how things are done in Washington, for moving pictures have just been taken of the local fire department in the act of starting out on a run and of preparations made to combat a conflagration; of the police department, and of the various heads of the District government.

No greater amount of publicity has ever been given a moving picture production than that being accorded "The Adventures of Kathlyn," which is being shown in installments at various houses in the different sections of the city. In addition to the advertisement given by these theaters, the story is being run serially in the Washington Star and nearly a column of space is daily devoted to it. The production is appearing at the Pickwick, Leader, Olympic, Circle, Princess, the New Masonic Temple Auditorium, and the Scenic.

Extensive preparations are being made by the Bureau of Immigration for a large and instructive exhibit at the Panama Pacific Exposition. One of the most interesting parts of this exhibit will be "a trip through Ellis Island, N. Y." Plans are now being perfected to obtain the necessary moving pictures for this purpose, and it is also proposed to have a set of pictures showing the various types of immigrants coming into the United States.

The new theater erected by the Crandall Corporation, at Ninth and E streets, Northwest, is the last word in moving picturedom, both as to exterior and interior construction. It is elaborately decorated throughout with paintings and frescoes of high class. The seats are comfortable and women patrons are provided with reading and retiring rooms, with a corps of courteous and well-trained attendants to look after their wants and to the welfare and comfort of the patrons. The Crandall Corporation is composed of men who have had considerable experience in the moving picture field. H. M. Crandall is the president; Samuel J. Steinberger, vice-president; H. A. Johnston, secretary-treasurer; and B. V. Maxwell and E. W. McGrath, directors.

BUFFALO.

THE Buffalo Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association has passed a resolution against the use of vaudeville on the Sunday programs of local theaters. The members have agreed to co-operate with Chief of Police Regan in enforcing the law which permits only moving pictures in Buffalo theaters the first day of the week. Harry Marsey, president of the association and proprietor of the Happy Hour moving picture theater, made the following statement: "We are surprised at the attitude of some of the theater managers of the city in defying the law which allows the showing of moving pictures only on Sunday. Certainly Chief Regan acted rightly when he ordered an investigation of the so-called Sunday concerts. These concerts are mostly vaudeville and should be stopped. The association and its members have promised all possible assistance in eliminating vaudeville entertainment from the Sunday shows. The managers should be satisfied when allowed to open their theaters Sundays without violating the law."

Crawford Wright has opened a new moving picture theater in Waterloo, N. Y. The house, which seats 300 persons, was designed by I. Edgar Hill, of that village.

Walter H. Foster, manager of the Family Moving Picture Theater, Buffalo, has recently featured Clarence Darrow, the noted criminal lawyer, in "From Dusk to Dawn." Mr. Foster used some effective advertising in connection with the program. "The Girl of the Sunny South" was another feature. Special Southern and patriotic music was an added attraction.

John R. Oishei, manager of the Teck Theater, Buffalo, gave an outside exhibition of moving pictures recently. The screen was on a building on Main street, near Niagara. The pictures showed a special train carrying the Pleasure Seekers Company, playing at that house. Marcus Loew, Joe Weber, Bobby North and other members of the company were shown, as they alighted from the train. The pictures proved a good advertisement and the Teck was crowded at each performance. A special Tango matinee was advertised by Mr. Oishei. The audience was received on the stage by the professional chaperon of the company, and was joined in the dance by Miss Virginia Evans and Clay Smith. Both Miss Evans and Mr. Smith gave instructions in the tango to those desiring them.

A Shetland pony, cart and harness will be given as first prie in a popularity contest being conducted by Henry M. Marcus, manager of the New Lyric Theater, Buffalo. Boys and girls under 16 are eligible. The prize will be awarded to the person receiving the largest number of votes. After the name of a child has been registered at the Lyric office any person attending a matinee performance at the theater will be entitled to vote for his favorite. Voting coupons will be distributed with every paid admission. The name of the child for whom the voter wishes to cast his ballot is written on the ballot and dropped into a box provided for that purpose.

A recent report from Ellicottville, N. Y., says in part: "Dooley & Lowry, proprietors of the local Dreamland, have purchased the lot adjoining their present building and in the spring will erect a modern moving picture theater."

Within the next few months the Tonawandans will see the opening of four new theaters. Three will be in Tonawanda, while the other will be in Oliver street, North Tonawanda. This will make seven motion picture shows in the two cities.

Mitchel H. Mark, of Buffalo, is president of the United Motion Picture Theaters, Ltd., which began business January 5. Mr. Mark has been closely identified with moving pictures for more than fifteen years, and according to the announcement of the company, "has organized more successful moving picture enterprises than any other one man on this continent." According to Henry J. Brock, of Buffalo, managing director, "the company is ready to consider any moving picture proposition, no matter how large." Besides Messrs. Mark and Brock, the following are directors of the corporation: Edward Cronyn, Toronto, vice-president; Sir Henry M. Pellatt, Toronto; Eugene L. Falk, Buffalo, secretary; S. Ginsburg, Buffalo, treasurer; Norman MacDonald, Buffalo, and Harry Brouse, Ottawa. The company has consolidated these interests: New Academy Theater Company, operating the Academy Theater in Buffalo; Mark-Brock Enterprises, Limited, operating the Francais Theater, Montreal; The Dominion Amusement Company, Limited, operating the Family Theater, Ottawa; The People's Amusement Company, Limited, operating the Family Theater, Montreal; the Francais, Limited, operating the Francais Theater, Ottawa, and the Metropolitan Theaters, Limited, operating the Strand Theater, Toronto. These companies were organized and managed by the Mark-Brock Theatrical Enterprises, of Buffalo. In connection with this last named concern, this official announcement has just been made:

"The business of this firm has grown so rapidly of late and so many favorable opportunities for successful modern picture houses in the United States and Canada are arising with the tremendous growth in the popularity of moving pictures, that it was decided to consolidate the above mentioned interests under the general management of Henry J. Brock, who has been associated for years with Mr. Mark. The purpose is to form the nucleus of a strong and growing chain of picture houses under one head." The outcome of this plan has been the incorporation of the United Motion Picture Theaters, Limited. In connection with the new company, President Mark says in part: "Motion pictures are still practically in their infancy, and notwithstanding the wonderful increase of public interest therein, the growth has been not only a healthy one, but shows unmistakable signs of permanence and still further development. The time was never more favorable for the formation of a large circuit of strictly high class picture houses than the present. Our attention at the present time has been directed to a number of most desirable locations for new houses, and our intention is to proceed immediately to make the necessary arrangements for theaters at these points. The selection of the site is of paramount importance, followed by the erection of a strictly high class theater on plans of the leading theatrical architects on the continent. The highest point of sanitation, ventilation and artistic beauty is achieved, and the only thing that remains is to give to the public the best and most beautiful motion pictures the world produces."

One of the pioneers in the moving picture business is James Wallingford, manager of the Hippodrome Moving Picture Theater, of Buffalo. Mr. Wallingford is a sensational advertiser, so far as his lobby display is concerned, but his advertising is never suggestive or otherwise objectionable. For instance he recently featured the humorous film: "When Ursus Threw the Bull." To attract attention to the production he had in his lobby two men impersonating Roman gladiators of the burlesque type, each wearing a fireman's hat. With them was a third person made up to represent a bull, the comic, not the ferocious kind.

The Hippodrome is at 263 Main street, where thousands pass daily, and the "free show" and the well displayed advertising drew a heavy trade. The impersonators paraded the principal streets and had banners announcing the show. They were provided with city permits to carry out this plan. The impersonations were good and helped to swell the box office receipts. Another feature recently exploited by Mr. Wallingford was "In the Sultan's Power." A man made up as a sultan was a special attraction. To boom another feature, "Taxicab 1098; or the Mystery of the Red Skull," the manager of the Hippodrome recently sent through the crowded streets a taxicab bearing large posters, red skull, etc. Of course much interest was aroused in the film and good business resulted. Mr. Wallingford says he was the first in Buffalo to introduce feature films and to hire Indians, cowboys and others for his lobby displays so they would match his pictures perfectly.

The Hippodrome is owned by the Gray Company, whose president is Edward Houghton. Mr. Wallingford has been manager for about three and a half years. Universal pictures and features comprise the entertainment at the Hippodrome. For a time he also managed Keith's Moving Picture Theater, situated next to the Hippodrome. At Keith's he put on excellent programs and charged ten cents admission.

Mr. Wallingford says he was the first to introduce the ten-cent moving picture show in Buffalo. He also put on high class soloists and musical acts at Keith's and featured the $25,000 organ in that house. He is not connected with that theater at present.

BILLY BISON.

LOUISVILLE.

PRACTICALLY all the film exchanges doing business in this section report better business than ever before, after the holiday lull, the increasing number of shows operating directly to make things more active with the concerns that supply programs. The past year was a prosperous one for the exchanges, but 1914, with the steady growth of the business, which is in evidence at this time, offers every prospect of being much better.

Manager H. D. Tieknor, of the Universal Film Exchange, said recently that increases in Southern business have been remarkable during the past few months, and that with the number of new theaters started in Kentucky and the immediate vicinity of Louisville, prospects for business could hardly be bettered.

E. H. Hammer, representing the Warner Feature Film Service Co., of Indianapolis, was in Louisville recently, booking some of the coming releases of his company with exhibitors.

Charles Berger, the box man, who has recently disposed of his house at Twenty-sixth and Portland avenue, the New Grand, still has his Corydon, Ind., theater, but intends selling it as soon as he can get a reasonable offer for the house. His box business is such as to demand all his attention, and as he has an idea that some personal work should be devoted to the photoplay business by the proprietor of a house, he prefers to stick to his earlier line of work.

"The Buccaneers," a three-part Gold Seal production, was the headliner at the Novelty theater recently, and made a pronounced hit with large audiences. On New Year's the house was literally "turning them away."

The Louisville Y. M. C. A. three-mile run, staged on New Year's day, offered a fine subject for a motion picture, and Carpenter & Johnson, Louisville photographers who have specialized on current events pictures, had intended to cover the event, but a difficulty which arose about the sanction of the race by the A. A. U., resulting in two races instead of one, caused the firm to give up the idea.

Despite the fact that motion picture exhibitors in Frankfort, Ky., have been successful in defeating prosecutions in two courts, Councilman L. B. Marshall, who instigated the fight against Sunday opening, caused further arrests recently, having warrants issued against E. K. Lyon, of the Grand, and Harry Bartram, of the recently opened Columbia. Pleas of former jeopardy were promptly sustained by the police court, and the exhibitors were consequently released. In accordance with this decision both houses were kept open on a recent Sunday. The crusading councilman has declared his intention of starting other prosecutions in the county court, although this is apparently useless in view of the decisions which have already been made in the other cases.

It is reported at Bowling Green, Ky., that the building recently vacated on Main street by Will V. Garvin has been leased by the Crescent Amusement Company, of Nashville, Tenn., and that the lessee will convert it into a new photoplay house.

Manager Shrode, of the Rex, at Hopkinsville, Ky., has denied a report which gained some credence to the effect that his house had been purchased and would be operated by the Crescent Amusement Company, of Nashville, Tenn., in connection with the Princess, which is already owned by the Nashville concern. He stated that a number of offers had been made for the Rex, but that all of them had been flatly refused. Mr. Shrode recently resigned the position which he has held in Hopkinsville for several years with the Imperial Tobacco Company, and will give his entire time and attention to the management of the Rex.

John H. Fiedler, who has been for some time leader of the orchestra of the Majestic theater, in Evansville, Ind., has resigned to accept a similar position with the orchestra of the Princess, of Hopkinsville, Ky., succeeding William von Otto. Mr. Fiedler is well-known in Hopkinsville as a musician, and will be welcomed by many who have heard his violin before.

The Princess theater, recently opened in Sturgis, Ky., is one of the most up-to-date in Western Kentucky, with every possible precaution against fire, including a steel operating booth, four wide aisles and ample exits, the doors being provided with patent clasps which make opening easy in case of an alarm. The house is new throughout, having been built for the purpose of serving as a motion picture theater.

Patrons of Winchester, Ky., photoplay houses have had a constant succession of big feature productions recently, the Pastime, the Lyric and the Winchester Opera House all offering big multi-reel plays recently. The first had the Famous Players' production of "In the Bishop's Carriage," with Mary Pickford, the next a Kalem two-reel version of Frederick Paulding's play "Trooper Billy," and the opera house presented "The Two Orphans."

H. A. Wilkerson, of Mt. Sterling, Ky., is planning to convert a centrally located building in that city into an up-to-date photoplay house, completely equipped and with a large seating capacity. Mr. Wilkerson has been manager of the Tabb Opera House in Mt. Sterling for the past three years, and will continue to manage the opera house in connection with the new theater. He also plans to use the Tabb for motion pictures when no other attraction is playing there. No name has yet been selected for the new house, and it is probable that a prize will be offered for the best name suggested.

M. C. Marion, a hardware and implement dealer of Elizabethtown, Ky., has purchased the Stewart Opera House for $12,000, and will conduct his business in the two large rooms on the first floor. The second floor will still be used for theatrical purposes, and will probably be occupied as a motion picture house during this season. Necessary alterations in the building will be made immediately.

Preston Grubbs, of Lawrenceburg, Ky., has sold the Pastime Theater to Selby Hahn and Albert Willis, both of Lawrenceburg, and moved back to Indiana with his family. He proposes to acquire a picture house in Indiana and continue in the business, but has made no definite arrangements along this line.

THE RETURN OF JACK BELLEW (Jan. 26).—Favored by Alice, Jack is in fine spirits, while Bill, who is also a suitor for the beautiful young girl's hand, receiving no encouragement from her, he is surly and inclined to be ugly. Both Jack and Bill are sailors. When they go to sea they are both set to "trim sail." While they are far out on the bowsprit of the schooner, Bill suddenly places his foot on Jack's neck and pushes him into the ocean. A search is made for the unfortunate sailor, but it proves fruitless and the ship continues on her way. When Bill returns to port, he informs Alice of Jack's supposed death and begs her to marry him, now that the other suitor is no longer on earth. She coldly turns from him and looks sadly out to sea.

Five years later, Jack, who has been cast on a desert isle, upon climbing to the top of a pile of rocks on the beach, which he has been in the habit of doing ever since he reached the island, sees a ship which has come into the bay for shelter from a violent storm. He is overjoyed at the sight and decides to swim out to her and return to civilization. He does so, reaching the ship just as she is "coming about" with all sails up, ready to head out on her voyage far from the desert isle. He manages to catch hold of a rope ladder hanging over the side and to pull himself aboard. He finds he is on his old rival's ship. Walking aft, he comes face to face with Bill. Bill thinks he sees Jack's ghost. He starts backwards, away from the wheel, so badly frightened he falls backwards over the rail into the sea. Life belts are thrown out to him, but to no avail. Bill disappears beneath the waves. When Jack is recognized by the sailors, he is greeted with great heartiness, and they all share in his happiness when he returns to his home port and is reunited with beautiful Alice, who never ceased to pine for him during his long absence.

PICKLES, ART AND SAUERKRAUT (Two parts—Jan. 27).—Jerry, a poor artist, makes what he thinks a great sketch, and surreptitiously takes it to a magazine. The Editor has a good laugh at Jerry's expense, but that is as far as he goes, he does not publish the sketch. Tired of art, Jerry marries a woman who owns a delicatessen store. She loves him to distraction and keeps a watchful eye upon him. He does not take kindly to her caresses, nor to the limburger cheese. His wife receives a telegram that her relatives are trying to do her out of a share of the family fortune. She hastens off to Hicksville to stop the proceedings, leaving Jerry to roam at will.

During his wife's absence Jerry is filled with artistic temperament and becomes reckless. He sends for a beautiful model, gets all of the cigars he wants, and wine flows freely. Their happiness is interrupted when Mrs. Hoolihan calls to leave her baby while she goes downtown to shop. Upon the model's offering to care for the baby, Mrs. Hoolihan is satisfied to leave it with her. They resume their enjoyment, but again are interfered with when Jerry's mother-in-law, with all her children, calls. To save himself, Jerry hits upon a plan by which he will get rid of her. He paints the baby's face with dots and tells her the baby has small-pox. Mother-in-law reports it to the Board of Health, and Jerry, Daisy, the model, and the baby are quarantined. His wife returns, but is not admitted. She is joined by Mrs. Hoolihan, who tells her about Daisy's presence. The wife vows revenge. A doctor is called who discovers the trick. Quarantine is raised and Jerry's wife enters her home. Her love for Jerry is so strong she forgives him and smothers him with kisses.

SCOTLAND FOREVER (Jan. 28).—When the drummer tells Hugh and Willie at the country store of the wonders of New York, nothing will suit them but that they take a trip to the metropolis. Rigged out in large-patterned new clothes, they bid good-bye to the home town, bound for a visit to the startling city. Reaching New York, they are so amazed that they can hardly proceed along the street, so intent are they in taking in what they see. An affable stranger bumps into Hugh. The stranger treats himself to a large dinner at Hugh's expense, which takes all the money Hugh has and half of Willie's. The stranger also relieves Willie of his other half, but Willie does not notice this until later.

The owner of a newspaper stand leaves the stand to chase some thieving boys. Willie discovers the loss of his money. An idea strikes Hugh. Hugh gets behind the stand, takes off his new trousers and hands them to Willie, who is to pawn them and buy a cheaper pair. Hugh decides to sell papers during his friend's absence. The proprietor comes back and orders Hugh to vacate. Hugh tries to explain, but a policeman is called. A merry crowd follows Hugh and the officer as they go down the street, Hugh holding part of the stand around him. Two Scotchmen in kilts, of the Caledonian Club, take Hugh from the officer and lead him to their club. They give him a job as assistant steward.

Hugh decides to visit his old home town. He writes to Willie he is coming, also that he never wears trousers now and doesn't miss them. When the letter is received it causes great consternation. The villagers indignantly decide to prevent Hugh's arrival. A prevention committee goes to meet the train. All the women of the village are locked indoors. A cold welcome is turned into a general warm greeting when Hugh, resplendent in his kilts, steps into the station platform. He is the lion of the town. Willie now understands that trousers do not make the man.

THE LUCKY ELOPEMENT (Jan. 30).—Though Madeline insists that she loves Gerald, the country soda-fountain clerk, her father vigorously forbids his attentions. Gerald longs for Madeline. He sees an article on the "Advice to the Lovelorn" column which states that should father-in-law object to son-in-law, but son-in-law not object to father-in-law, then elopement is the happy solution. He writes to Madeline that should she think well of it, he will call for her that evening, beneath her window, at eleven o'clock. He sends the message by a boy whom he finds reading a sign which has just been tacked up by the country sheriff, offering a reward of $500 for the arrest of "Sneaky Bill" and "Slippery Ike." It occurs to Gerald that the money would come in very nicely to him at this time.

Madeline gives the boy a written reply that when the clock strikes eleven she will be waiting at her window. The boy, having a mischievous disposition, and knowing the contents of Gerald's message and the words of Madeline's reply, tells all he knows to Madeline's father for the sum of one shiny half dollar.

Darkness comes over the land, but all is not peaceful. Two gentlemen of crime are about to rob Madeline's father's home. "Sneaky Bill" is in the dining-room helping himself to the silverware. "Slippery Ike" waits outside to receive the satchel containing the booty. Madeline hears a disturbance, thinks it is Gerald, comes down, and passes her grip out to Ike. Father hears noises, comes down, catches Madeline, takes her upstairs, and locks her in her room. He returns and throws a blanket over Ike's head, taking him to the barn for safe keeping, thinking it is Gerald. Gerald arrives, late, and receives from the hands of Bill a satchel filled with the family silver. Incidentally, Gerald has a fight with Bill, thereby aiding the sheriff, who luckily arrives in the nick of time to handcuff two criminals, Bill and Ike. Gerald is promised the $500, and he elopes with Madeline by strategically taking her from the house, after flooring her expostulating father with a sofa-cushion.

THE LITTLE BUGLER (Jan. 29).—On his birthday, Tommy, Major Shaw's little son, receives a small bugle. Tommy's one wish is to be a soldier. He soon becomes an adept little bugler. Major Shaw receives a dispatch ordering him to lead his regiment to the front to quell a rebellion. Tommy begs to go too, but his father tells him that he is too young yet and that he will have plenty of time to be a soldier when he grows up. The night the regiment leaves, Tommy sits up in bed and listens till all is quiet. He decides he cannot stay behind, dresses quickly, takes his precious bugle and slips out. He makes his way to the yards where the Commissariat wagons are waiting and crawls into one of them.

At the first bivouac the next day Tommy is discovered fast asleep in the wagon. The soldiers take him to Major Shaw. It is too late to send him back, so his father consigns him to the care of the officer in charge of the ambulance corps, thinking he will be safe under the protection of the Red Cross. The regiment reaches the front and goes into action. Tommy picks up some field glasses, and to his great joy, sees all that is going on. Men are falling to the right and left; shells are bursting in mid-air; soldiers are charging and retreating over the open spaces and through the tropical marshland swamps. Major Shaw stands back of his regiment with a bugler at his side and suddenly realizes the need of immediate action. He raises his sword and orders the bugler to sound the "Charge." The boy is killed as he steps forward to place the bugle to his lips.

Tommy drops the field glasses and runs towards the spot where the dead bugler lies. Major Shaw wildly turns to the nearest man, "Can no one blow to the call to charge?" Tommy, standing beside him, places his bugle to his lips and sounds the thrilling command. Major Shaw looks around at his boy in surprise and wonderment. When the war is over, Tommy, in uniform, proudly marches with the regiment. He is honored now with the title of The Little Bugler.

THE LOVE OF TOKIWA (Special—2 parts—Jan. 31).—When Yoshisada speaks to cruel Kajiwara, the wealthy Japanese fisherman, for the hand of his daughter, Tokiwa, he is not graciously received. This does not bring tears to the wondrous, almond-shaped eyes of Tokiwa; she does not like Yoshisada. Neither is she fond of her father, who beats her and makes her work very hard. She has a friend in Anna Lang, who has a missionary school in the village, and in Richard Davis, who comes to the town to deal with Kajiwara concerning the village catch. Davis loves Anna; they are engaged to be married. They decide that they will take the little Jap girl away with them to the city. Tokiwa has fallen in love with Davis and mistakes his kindness for love. He tells her that he will take her away to a place where she will be very happy. His words are overheard by Yoshisada, who swears that it will never happen.

Yoshisada tells Tokiwa's father of the American's words and together they plan a hurried wedding. The girl is literally sold to Yoshisada, that her services may not go to someone other than her father. Poor Tokiwa is in despair when she learns of the plans for her future. A telegram comes to Anna, saying that the American, who has been away, is coming back. Tokiwa borrows the telegram, having learned how to read at the mission school. Her father sees the message. He tells Yoshisada, who vows that the American shall not reach the village alive. Tokiwa sends up a white dove which Davis had given her, with a prayer to save him. Yoshisada waylays Davis, and as he is passing in his car on a road hundreds of feet below the cliff, he rolls a huge boulder down upon him and believes he has killed him. Yoshisada loses his life at this place later, by falling over the cliff. Tokiwa, dressed all in white, and with wreaths of flowers about her, enters her boat and goes out alone into the sunset of the sea to find the heaven of the Americans. Later, when Anna and Davis and the villagers come to the beach to find her, they see an upturned boat drifting out on the silent waves.

ESSANAY.

THE TESTING FIRE (Jan. 27).—Gladys Norton, a sweet little country girl, receives a letter from her sweetheart, saying that after four years of study in the city, he is coming back. Gladys is overjoyed. Theresa, Gladys' cousin, desiring to spend a few quiet weeks in the country, pays the Nortons a surprise visit and arrives on the same train with Irwin. The city cousin captivates Irwin with her beautiful clothes and manners. Poor little Gladys sobs her heart out—seeing the two together continuously. Irwin, secure in his belief that he has won Theresa, is rudely awakened when her sweetheart from the city calls to take her home. Realizing that he did not pass the testing fire, Irwin decides to leave, but Gladys turns his path of thorns into a bed of roses and a happy ending is the consequence.

NEARLY MARRIED (Jan. 28).—Russell Shirley calls on Harriet Gorman, to whom he is engaged, and they happily plan for their wedding, which is to take place in a few days. On the night of the wedding the guests are assembled and the minister is half through with the ceremony, when Russell suddenly discovers that the ring with which to seal the marriage is not on his person and is nowhere to be found. He rushes out, and finds all the stores closed. He is in despair, but finally, in the wee small hours of the morning, after all the guests have departed and even father and mother have retired, the ring is found in an unusual manner, and the ceremony finished, much to the enjoyment of the two.

WHAT CAME TO BAR Q (Jan. 29).—Charles Clemens, a ranch owner, sends a letter to Fred Church, his foreman, informing him that his son and daughter are coming to spend their vacation on the ranch. Church and the boys meet the stage, and to their amazement and secret joy, find that the boy is very effeminate. What the boys do to Clarence is a scream, but his sister, who is more of a boy than he is, gets even with them for hazing her brother, and the boys are forced to take off their hats to her.

BRONCHO BILLY AND THE SETTLER'S DAUGHTER (Jan. 31).—Old Harry Todd and his daughter, Marguerite, are in the West prospecting for gold. They meet Broncho Billy, who takes dinner with them and later continues on his way. As he is riding across the plains thinking of Marguerite, he happens to see an Indian at the top of a hill, looking down upon the prospector and his daughter. Broncho Billy warns Todd and his daughter and the settler hastens to the fort to notify the soldiers that the Indians are up to trouble. During Todd's absence, the Indians close in about Broncho and Marguerite, who have taken refuge in an abandoned hut. The redskins set the shack ablaze and in the ensuing conflict Broncho Billy is wounded. The soldiers arrive in time to save the two from the hands of the Indians, which brings about a very happy ending.

THE GIRL AT THE CURTAIN (Special—2 parts—Jan. 30).—When Warren Bradley, a promising young city lawyer, learns that there is a peculiar provision in his uncle's will which bequeathes him half of a very large fortune, he loses no time in finding out the details. Very simple. He is to marry a distant relative, a young lady whom he has never seen. In order to get the money he is quite satisfied to marry almost anybody—but not so the young lady. Mary Burns, a prim and pretty country school teacher, with quite firm notions of her own, spurns the proposal, and refuses to have anything to do with him—even so much as SEE him. "Then you will marry me without seeing me. Come." This is what he wires in answer. Mary would ignore this appeal also but for the distressful financial conditions her uncle at the time is plunged in. So she goes to the city and the marriage is performed with the couple standing at either side of a pair of curtains and she leaves without either she or her husband seeing each other. However, they do have an awkward encounter on the street later, but both are unaware of their relationship. Mary returns to the farm and saves her uncle, then she decides she wants to become a business woman and studies stenography. Through a kindly old lawyer, who had befriended her in the city at the time of her marriage, she applies for a position. This wily old chap has a scheme of his own and when Mary arrives at the address he has sent her she finds herself face to face with her husband.

Mary is ushered into young Bradley's office by the young lawyer himself, while the poor girl is struggling with a thousand conflicting emotions. What a handsome fellow! How kind and solicitous! What an opportunity to study him. Yes, and there have been other young ladies who have thought the same thing and at this moment calls. Mary immediately finds herself becoming jealous and in a panicky moment tries to escape, but is not successful. Six months pass and Bradley has fallen in love with his stenographer. Now he deplores that idiotic marriage for money and why on earth doesn't that country school ma'am try to get a divorce? He decides to write and insist on her starting suit or he will do so himself. When he dictates this astounding letter to Mary, who, of course, is now under an assumed name, a thousand fears assail her. He wants to get a divorce from her, so she thinks, so he may be able to marry this society woman. She never finishes the letter, for while he is out of the room for a moment she seizes her wraps and runs away. Later, in the form of a telegram: "Then you will marry me without seeing me," which Bradley finds in Mary's desk, the young lawyer learns that the masquerading stenographer is his wife. In a few minutes he is at her rooms and has smothered her with kisses. Love came in where only sordid money desires had been before. The little country schoolma'am knew how to work it.

SELIG.

HIS GUIDING SPIRIT (Jan. 20).—Ella Walton, like many another brave sister of her time, through the loss of her soldier sweetheart, drifts into the realm of the lovable old maid, who devotes all her time and lavishes all her affection on the infant child of a dead brother. Unfortunately, this child, after coming to manhood, became a drunkard, who broke the heart and caused the death of his aunt. The drift of the drama is that she returns in spirit and through her guiding influence, causes him to break away from the slavery of drink, become a man again and return to the love of a beautiful girl, who had abandoned him on account of his debauchery.

THE CHARMED ARROW (Jan. 21).—Rushing Wind, a prehistoric warrior, is strong and skilled in every accomplishment the Indian prizes except archery. He grieves because he cannot compete with the other young braves in forwarding the winged shaft, for this one weakness makes him the laughing stock in his village. Break of Day, who loves him devotedly, persuades him to invoke the aid of the Medicine Man, her father, to eliminate his one weakness. The magician gives Rushing Wind a charmed arrow that never misses its mark, but which will, if lost, bring misfortune. Having made the conquest complete through this medium, Rushing Wind takes the maiden to wife.

In time, he grows suspicious, observing her embroidering, in secret, an elaborate leathern shirt. She intends to surprise her husband with this gift, but he misconstrues the secrecy, believing she has a lover. One day as she is drifting alone in her canoe, he shoots her with the charmed arrow. The little boat bearing the body of Break of Day, pierced by the arrow, floats down the river to the sea and is cast on the shore. Returning to his wigwam, Rushing Wind finds the shirt, and observing it closely, sees that it is embroidered with his own totem. Then great grief strikes him for her fidelity and he sets out to find the body of his lost one.

He dies in the quest, but his soul goes on—continues the search through the centuries. This is characterized by a series of remarkable dissolves showing the building of a mission, the immigrant train, and then the view of a modern city. In later life, the reincarnated Rushing Wind finds the modern Break of Day alone upon the beach where the canoe was cast up by the sea. She picks up from the sands the charmed arrow of the lost centuries and thus the pair are reunited.

A FRIEND IN NEED (Jan. 22).—Jimmy Donovan gets a passenger for his automobile to make an all-day trip to the Stanley ranch. When they have almost reached their destination, the engine goes "dead," but the Stanley girls, riding bronchos, come to the rescue and drag the car on to the ranch at the end of their ropes. When they arrive at the place, it suddenly develops that Jim's passenger is a land-shark, who has come to force payment on the note of the ranch man. The latter is unable to pay and asks for time. This is refused and the shark decides to seize everything on the place by means of a hurried sale. This sets Jim's wits to work. He finds through a newspaper clipping that the Northern Arizona Fair may be postponed by reason of lacking attractions. He gets a swift riding cowpuncher to take a note to the president of the association, telling him that he can furnish an entire program. This information gets through by relays and word is quickly returned that a bonus of a thousand dollars will be paid and other prizes to aggregate five thousand, in case he keeps his promise. This gives opportunity to show all the broncho busters in wonderful feats of strength, nerve and agility, at the Fair. They capture every prize and the bonus. Then begins a wild ride across the plains to intercept the sheriff's sale at the Stanley ranch. The car reaches the ranch and the boys jump out with enough money to pay all the indebtedness, while the land shark is paid up and forced out on the toe of the boot. While Jimmy was busy thinking up plans to relieve the head of the ranch, he was not too busy to overlook one of the charming Stanley girls. He having rescued the father, the latter gives his consent to the wedding of the daughter.

DOC YAK, MOVING PICTURE ARTIST (Jan. 23).—Everyone is interested in the making of a modern newspaper, and a peep behind the doors in "the world's greatest"—shows how ink flies when inspiration strikes, or the persistent copy boy (known as "the devil") stands at the artist's elbow urging haste. How Old Doc Yak materializes in the busy brain of the cartoonist, and walks right into the picture, adding to the gaiety of nations, is shown most amusingly. After the page is drawn Doc Yak becomes animated, pours gasoline into his tank, cranks up and whirls off in a cloud of smoke. There is only one Doc Yak, and Sidney Smith is his creator, general director and faithful delineator.

THE CONSPIRATORS (Jan. 27).—Miss Lorimer, a clever Secret Service operative of the United States Government, is detailed to hunt down the plans of a band of conspirators plotting a South American revolution. By assuming deafness, her weakness becomes known, as she is a familiar patron at a cafe frequented by the revolutionists. Accustomed to her presence and familiar with her failing, they talk freely and she is enabled to overhear their plans. She next trails them to their headquarters and spies upon them through a skylight. However, she is not as clever at porch-climbing as she is in the restaurant; they discover her and make her a prisoner. She is then forced to meet a severe ordeal, the second degree, in the attempt to make her betray her sense of hearing. Failing in this, they bind her and leave her in the deserted house.

Webster, a keen reporter, gets "a line on this case" about the same time as the Secret Service operative, and also traces the conspirators to their

Mr. J. H. Hallberg, 36 East 23rd St, New York City.

Dear Mr. Hallberg: We received your "HALLBERG" A. C. to D. C. Economizer O K., and I want to thank you for the prompt attention and quick shipment of this order. We have it properly installed and I am very happily surprised with the result. I naturally expected to get better results from the D. C. than from the A. C. when I purchased the machine, but I am frank to say that the improvement is far beyond my expectations. I find that with one-third the amperage I am able to get a beautiful Kinemacolor picture, the light being a pleasure to contemplate, while the work and worry of the operator is reduced to a minimum. For the black and white picture about one-half of the amperage used when we are running on A. C. gives me a better picture than I was ever able to produce before. The results are so entirely satisfactory that my only regret is that we did not install the ECONOMIZER months ago.

I have had a number of exhibitors in this territory in to look the machine over, and all are very much impressed with the improved light and saving in current. I think you will be receiving some orders soon from some of the exhibitors in this territory. Everything is now working smoothly and business is satisfactory. Hoping it is the same with you, and with best wishes for a prosperous New Year for the HOUSE OF QUALITY, I am, headquarters. The place seems deserted, but he happens to look up at a heavily blinded window just in time. Miss Lorimer has freed herself from her bonds to find herself imprisoned behind locked doors and barred windows. She takes off her stocking, unravels it, and lets a note down by it from the window. It is this that attracts reporter Webster's attention. He sees it and a few moments later she is rescued. The two unaided, then follow their quarry and capture the filibusters as they are about to sail away with a shipload of ammunition. Having done their duty to their superiors they find that Cupid has the call and they plight their troth.

Yours very truly,

THE OLD VS. THE NEW (Jan. 28).—The everyday things that go to make up life, frequently find a telling occupation in the silent drama, and such have been utilized in this play, to make it pathetic and convincing. Dr. Foster, a country practitioner of the old school, has attained the age of three score and ten, and "is set" in his ideas as to the practice of medicine. Young Dr. Hastings comes to that town and hangs out his shingle as physician and surgeon. The old gentleman naturally resents his presence and this reaches a climax when Hastings dares to disagree with him on a case in which he is called in consultation. To make matters more embarrassing Dr. Hastings has become interested in the elder doctor's daughter, Marion, but she shares her father's resentment and the friendship of the young people is broken. Marion is a pale, anaemic girl and later falls dangerously ill. Dr. Foster treats her with the old-time drug doses until he, himself, at last recognizes that he is entirely wrong and sends to a distant city for Dr. Meserve, a noted specialist, to come at once. Later that same day Dr. Foster receives a telegram from his distant friend stating that it will be impossible to come at the time.

In the interim, Marion's condition has grown alarming. For the first time the old man's pride and faith in himself is shaken, and he goes to Hastings and implores his aid. The latter gladly complies and observes that an immediate operation is necessary. Later, upon Marion's complete recovery, the two physicians, the old and the new school, form a business partnership, while Marion and Hastings form a partnership for life.

BRINGING UP HUBBY (Jan. 29).—Mrs. Smith, intent upon bringing up her daughter, Cecil, who is about to be married to John, gives her a few practical directions about schooling a husband in the beginning, so that he will learn to love, honor and obey without question. John does not really know that he has been selected for the bridegroom, as he is very bashful, but when he gets into the Smith home and the Smith child falls upon his neck, with a cinch that the Smith mother witnesses the proceeding, he is resigned to the fact that he is in to become a member of the family. The next scene shows that the Smith family hopes have been realized. Cecil has decorated every bit of furniture in the dining-room with bow ribbons, so that when John comes in he gets more or less fussed and tangled up. She hustles him into a smoking jacket, produces his slippers, and then he dutifully produces his pay roll. As he lays the bills upon the table, she daintily plucks off the large denominations and then pecks him a kiss.

They go walking and he tries to stop at a cigar store for a smoke, but she hustles him along. She is saving his money—not! She appears at the house with a $40.00 hat that has been reduced to $38.88. She gives the usual fuss donation, but John's smile is worthless now, when he sees the feather bargain. He hardly has time to recover from the attack before she produces a beautiful bargain cloak that has a special discount of 68 cents. John looks and gasps wildly for air, and finally, as she drags him off to the opera, where tariffs are high, he conceives a plan of getting even. He invites her to refreshments after the opera. He sets up a game with the waiter. The bill for the luncheon is $8.50, and John, after assiduous "digging" in his dress jeans, can produce only a silver dollar and a Waterbury watch. So they are hauled off to the station house to think things over. This thoroughly reforms the wife, and John controls his own bank account thereafter.

A SPLENDID SACRIFICE (Jan. 30).—Vivian Clifford is the frivolous and pleasure-loving wife of Rodney, a hard-working business man, who chafes under the restraint of home and two little children. One day she concludes to leave the family roof for awhile, and goes to New York to visit Bohemian friends. While there, she meets Royal LeClerq, an artist, becomes fascinated by him, and poses for him. Paul Stratton, Clifford's best friend, happens to be in New York and through friendship, undertakes to investigate the company she has chosen.

While Vivian has been neglecting her home, lonesome Rodney Clifford has been more or less forlorn, but is confronted by the presence of a cousin of Vivian, Alice Barlow, who comes to visit him. One of the children is taken very ill and she remains to nurse it. This brings the pair together, and she seems to be Rodney's ideal. Stratton wires Clifford that he is bringing his wife home. This participates a climax in the affairs of her cousin and her husband, and Alice prepares to return to her Western home. As Vivian enters, under the escort of Stratton, Alice takes her departure on the arm of the same friend of the family. Vivian selfishly rebukes the better woman—her cousin—for her indiscretion in remaining under the same roof with her husband while she was absent in New York on important matters of business, and the sacrifical spirit keeps the seal of silence under the taunt.

TOO LATE (Special—2 parts—Jan. 19).—Johann Sonnenthal, composer, meets Elsa Linden. She is engaged at the time to Robert von Erlen, but Sonnenthal attracts her. She, however, has neither depth of character to fathom his great love, nor to appreciate his divine gift of music. Her frivolous nature after marriage clamors for the gaiety and adulation of the butterfly life that she had led before meeting him. One day she happens to encounter Robert von Erlen and incidentally draws comparisons that are unfavorable to her dignified and preoccupied husband. Her hatred of his music breaks out so violently that she tears up his most valued composition. Sonnenthal is dazed at her daring and impertinence and staggers out into the open.

At this stage, Von Erlen happens to meet him, appears to divine the break and determines to again see his old sweetheart. After hours of aimless wandering in the seclusion of the forest, Sonnenthal returns to his home at nightfall, to find it dark and empty. The truth dawns upon him – his wife has gone and left him. He places a candle in the window, with a prayer, indicating that she is forgiven and may return. Then he watches through the livelong night, and when morning dawns the candle flickers out and his hope withers. The last dissolve of this reel shows the musician snatching up his hated music in fury, tearing it in bits, and as it flutters like snow upon the floor, he falls upon it, cold and unconscious.

The following morning the composer comes to himself and attempts to bring order out of chaos. He picks up his disarranged music and rearranges it. He begins to play—Mendlesohn-Bartholdy passing that way instantly recognizes a masterpiece. He quietly enters the room and touches Sonnenthal upon the shoulder. Mendelssohn indicates that the music he has heard is masterful. Then Sonnenthal snatches the patched manuscript from the music-desk and pushes it into Mendelssohn's hands, beseeching him to have it recognized.

The succeeding scene is remarkable and interesting in personalities presenting: Schumann, Chopin, and other figures of music of the day, gathered at Mendelssohn's house. Among the guests is Elsa, now the wife of Von Erlen. The host takes advantage of the opportunity to introduce the music he received from Sonnenthal, playing it himself. All are deeply moved by its pathetic phrases; but none more than Elsa, who reads its message of her ruined life, of his suffering. Sonnenthal is shown alone in his home, tossing on his bed in fever. The last candle he will ever light to guide Elsa back is already half burned away. He watches it slowly, but helplessly, as it burns away.

Elsa hurries away from the reception and, arriving at her house, is goaded beyond endurance by Von Erlen's caustic remarks. She resolves to make whatever amends she now can to Sonnenthal, and slipping into a cloak, silently glides out into the night. In the dawn of the morning she comes, just as the candle is sputtering in its socket. Sonnenthal has regained consciousness, looks out toward the window when Elsa appears in the doorway. Overcoming his great weakness, he stretches out his arms to her, but the effort is too great. He falls back dead, the candle flickers out, Elsa stands a moment transfixed with horror, then kneels by his side and clasps the dead hands. Suddenly she comes to a realizing sense of her unworthiness, shrinks back and stumbles, sobbing, from the room. The rays of the rising sun seem to halo Sonnenthal's form, as through the open door pass the allegorical figures representing Fame, Riches, Peace and Plenty. They slowly file into the room, to find that they have come all too late.

THE ADVENTURES OF KATHLYN—NO. 3—THE TEMPLE OF THE LION (Jan. 26).—After the daring and cunning of the American engineer blew up the Amphitheater with his land mines, saving Kathlyn from the hungry lions, he dragged her from the wreckage to a secluded spot close by, where Ramabai and Pundita were waiting with elephants. So they all are elevated into the howdahs, the mahouts prod the big beasts and then follows a flight through the jungle. Finally in the dawn of the morning, they stop for water. A baboon runs close to the trail, frightening Kathlyn's elephant mount, which runs away. The mahout tries to stop the terrified beast, but he is thrown against a tree, and the elephant continues its frantic pace with Kathlyn, alone. The other members of the entourage pursue her; but the runaway gains so fast that Kathlyn is soon lost to their view in the recesses of the forest.

Finally the weary elephant halts at the gates of a city, and Kathlyn again finds herself a stranger captive. She happens along about the time the funeral ceremony of a Parsee is being celebrated. The scene transfers to the Burning Gat, where a cremation is in process, after the primitive fashion of the Parsee. The widow is led to the pyre to be sacrificed with her husband for suttee. She shrieks with fear, declaring she will never give herself to the rite. The head man then shouts to them that a victim is providentially at hand to be sacrificed upon the pyre to propitiate the gods. Thereupon he leads in Kathlyn, the white captive. She is bound and placed upon the smoking pile. The preparations are made for her final resignation—but she does not resign. As the fire is started, the natives start to decorously retire, their flight being accelerated by the appearance of a mad elephant. It happens to be Kathlyn's erratic mount. It recognizes its mistress and, reaching up to the top of the pyre, takes her from the flames that are now biting her garments. As the big beast rescues the fair one and rushes away, the scene dims.

The day is far spent; likewise the elephant, and as night comes on, they approach the portico of a ruined temple. The animal kneels and Kathlyn descends, weary from the long journey. Across the pillared portico strolls a prowling lion. Other parts of the structure show that the carnivora are chiefly its habitants. Kathlyn alights and stands close to the sarcophagus. She observes the lion and leaps into the carved cavity. So she passes the night in terror, frequently seeking safety in the recesses of the ancient tomb as the black maned lion passes and repasses in search of prey.

As morning comes, a priest ventures into the temple, and observing Kathlyn miraculously rising from the sarcophagus after her terrible rest, he views her as an apparition, and falls at her feet in worship. He calls his associates—they bring her food and drink and elect her to be high priestess in their temple; and henceforth she must keep alive by night and day the fire that will ward off evil spirits from that region. The unhappy young queen again finds herself not only a priestess, but a prisoner. One night in fleeing from the prowling lion she stumbles against an idol it falls and is broken into a thousand pieces. The following morning the natives, discovering the destruction, are enraged beyond endurance, rushing at Kathlyn as if to slay her. She wards them off, reminding them that as high priestess her person is sacred. Then fortunately recurs to her the accomplishment of her girlhood days with clay modeling in her far away California studio. She plans to save herself from the fury of the fanatics by telling them that she has the power to recreate their idol. She orders clay and water and at once begins modeling a reproduction o the idol from memory. When the natives behold this completed work of art, they fall to the ground in abject obeseisance, and she stands intrenched more strongly than ever in their reverence. Thus she again saves her life by her ready wit and her facility of accomplishment.

The marauding lion has grown bolder and hungrier and now makes his rounds on the portico in broad daylight. Having escaped the fury of the mob, Kathlyn now is about to become the prey of a savage beast. She flies for her life from the temple to the river. It would appear that only a miracle could save her now.

LUBIN.

THE WINDFALL (Jan. 26).—Two sisters, Anna and Grace Carson, working girls, receive through a London lawyer, notice of a legacy of $500 each. The news spreads until it is thought to be $50,000. Tradesmen shower their goods upon the girls. Anna is prudent, but headstrong Grace makes lavish selections. Believing them to be heiresses, a society leader introduces the girls at a reception and her son, Phillip, is attracted to Anna. The girls become favorites and are swept into reckless extravagance and debt. Phillip proposes to Anna, but she refuses rather than confess the deception. Bills pour in and creditors clamor. The girls run away, leaving a note to their creditors begging for time. Anna goes ahead to get the tickets, leaving Grace to buy something. When Grace does not follow Anna boards the train to New York, confident that her sister is in another car. Thus they are separated, for Grace, meanwhile, has been run down by an auto and lies unconscious in a hospital. Anna is frantic over her sister's absence and suspects that she has gone to Phillip for aid. Not daring to reveal her whereabouts, she secures a room and looks for work. Grace leaves the hospital and goes to New York. She rents a room next door to Anna's lodging place. Undreamed by either, the sisters are living on opposite sides of the airshaft. The creditors take possession of the old home and propose an auction. Phillip prevails upon them to wait, feeling that he must and will trace the girls. He takes charge of mail for Anna and his search brings him to New York. Anna, discouraged and exhausted, is eating her frugal dinner. Across the way Grace is heating water on an alcohol stove. It overturns and soon the room is in flames, with Grace panic-stricken. Anna knows that someone needs help. Snatching several bed slats, she swings them across the shaft, crosses the narrow sagging bridge and plunges into the room to find Grace unconscious. The fire has been discovered and the first passer-by is urged to give the alarm. The man is Phillip. Anna carries her sister across to safety just as the firemen and Phillip burst in. There is recognition all around. Phillip gives Anna the undelivered letter. She learns that through an error in cabling the legacy is not $500, but $5,000. The debts are paid in full and Anna admits that now nothing stands between Phillip and herself.

HIS EXCELLENCY (Jan. 27).—Andres Sepulveda, president of a small Latin-American republic, has attained his high office at the age of twenty-five. The cares and responsibilities of office weigh upon him and he longs for a taste of freedom. In one of his fits of despondency he happens to see from a window of his palace a group of strolling musicians and he contrasts their condition with his. He resolves to doff his uniform and replace it with the dress of the common people, and to take a vacation during which he may act like the most care-free of his subjects. Changing his clothes, he slips out of the palace. He sees a street brawl wherein two intoxicated men set upon an unoffending boy. The president goes to the lad's rescue and beats off his assailants. This leads later to his meeting Inez Garcia, the sister of the boy.

Between Inez and the young president, whose identity she does not suspect, there quickly grows a strong bond of attraction and he becomes a visitor at her home. One afternoon he takes her to a secluded part of the Plaza and asks her to be his wife. Although willing to accept him, she coquettishly puts him off, telling him to come to her house next day for his answer. Next day, while the president is on his way to visit her, Inez's father, a private in the army, is arrested on a charge of political conspiracy. When Andres arrives the father has just been taken away and the girl is in tears. He tries to comfort her and then, as a happy thought comes to him, urges her to go to the president and tell him her troubles. She demurs, saying that she would not dare to commit such a bold act, but he persuades her, promising to go with her. On the way Sepulvea makes an excuse to drop into a district police station. He sends a message, ordering that the prisoner be released and taken to the executive office. Arriving at the palace, the girl becomes frightened at the guards and holds back expecting to be stopped, but to her astonishment they salute. She is puzzled and asks for an explanation, but Andres refuses. At the governor's office they are admitted by the secretary, who takes his cue from the president's wink. When the father is brought in the girl rushes into his arms. Then she hears the secretary respectfully address her companion os "Your Excellency" and the truth bursts upon her. She attempts to kiss his hand, but he draws her into his arms and insists upon having his answer.

TREASURES ON EARTH (Special—2 parts—Jan. 29).—Mark Dow, a money lender in an oil town, sells an oil property for $150,000. The possession of this money adds to his greed for more and he becomes so miserly that he refuses his wife and child the absolute necessities of life. This leads to a quarrel and his wife leaves the house, taking the child with her. Dow, in his strange way, loves his wife and consoles himself with the thought that she will soon return.

Time passes, however, and he is still alone. He moves to Philadelphia, changing his name and becomes chief owner of an oil refinery. The wife for years has a hard struggle, and when William, the boy, grows up he secures a job in the plant of which his father, now known as Mark Dowling, is president, neither knowing the identity of the other. One day Mark, by accident, meets his wife and offers his hand, which she refuses. This intensifies the friction.

Dow resolves to let his wife pass out of his life forever and she in her bitterness does not even speak of the meeting to her son. In the humble boarding-house where the mother and son live there also lives Grace Roth, stenographer to the old man. Wiliam and Grace fall in love, but each realize that a marriage would be a greater burden than present circumstances would permit. Dowling still controlled by his avarice, attempts to reduce the wages of the workmen, at which they resist, and Dowling, despite the protests of the other heirs, orders a lockout. He transacts his business at a squalid home just opposite the plant. His life is filled with bitterness and his only companion is a poor little orphan girl, who visits him often. William as head of the workmen endeavors to stop the lockout, but is unsuccessful. The mother is sick and the doctor tells William that she must be sent to Arizona or some other dry climate to save her life. Made desperate, the boy resolves to make a demand for money; he enters Dowling's house and tells his story, which touches the heart of the little orphan girl. She pleads until the old man agrees to loan him $500 on a note. When William signs the note, Dowling recognizes that it is his own son. Destroying the paper he gives him one thousand dollars. William hastens home to tell his mother of the good fortune and she then informs him that Mr. Dowling is his father. At this moment they see that the plant is on fire, also Dowling's house. The boy rushes to the rescue, and saves his father and the little orphan girl. After the fire the family visits the ruins. A reconciliation takes place and, joining hands, they see the beginning of a new and happier future.

AN UNINTENTIONAL HERO (Jan. 30).—Bob Davis and Harry Colborn are rivals for the favor of Helen Pollard, their landlord's daughter, who is an ardent hero worshiper. To settle the rivalry, Bob takes advantage of a burglar scare and arranges with a friend to disguise himself as a burglar and enter the house. Bob is to attack him single-handed and drag him out in triumph, allowing him to "escape" when out of sight. Harry overhears the plan and decides to take a hand in it. The fake burglar is arrested as he is about to get in a window, a real burglar gets into the house and is captured by Harry. The fake burglar confesses and Harry collects his reward, which is the little hand of the fair Helen.

A STAGE-DOOR FLIRTATION (Jan. 30).—Levi and Schwartz, two Yiddish sports, become infatuated with Choocheata, the dancer; their attentions annoy her. Her husband, Fleming, a female impersonator, plans revenge. Dressing up in Choocheata's street clothes, Fleming keeps an appointment with Levi, at a swell cafe. Levi proposes marriage to the supposed dancer, but he soon learns his mistake when he receives a good beating. Fleming then meets Schwartz and gives him the same treatment. The two sports return to the theater, where they receive another beating and are thrown out into the street, sadder but wiser.

THE PALE OF PREJUDICE (Jan. 31).—Robert Dane, a young physician, becomes engaged to Violet Hope, daughter of the governor, who approves her choice. Hope is passionately devoted to his child. Dane, despite his skill, loses a patient and the futility of his drugs in this case causes him to give consideration to a new and unrecognized no-drug method of treating disease. His investigations convince him of the merits of the method, and he begins to use it in his practice with success, entirely abandoning the practices of the recognied schools of medicine. In consequence, his license as a physician is canceled, and he is forbidden to practice, to do so without a license being a criminal act. Regarding Dane as a ruined man, Hope orders his daughter to break her engagement, and forbids Dane in the house. Soon after, Violet falls ill of a deadly malady, the same disease from which Dane's patient died, but which, Dane has since demonstrated, yields readily to the new treatment. Violet is attended by the foremost physicians of the state, the committee which canceled Dane's license to practice, but their verdict is that she must die, that she will not live an hour after their consultation. Word of this reaches Dane and he grows frantic. He appeals to Violet's father for permission to try his new method, but is refused. Utterly reckless and determined to save the girl he loves, Dane resorts to violent means, and, preventing interference with his revolver, makes his way to the girl's room, forcing all except a nurse to leave. The aid of the police is procured and the closed door of the bedroom cautiously approached. It is at once opened upon a knock, and Dane steps out, smiling in his happiness to tell them that Violet will recover, and is now quietly sleeping. When the dazed governor realizes what has occurred Dane is quickly released by the officers to whom he has surrendered. Two months later the press announces that, at the request of the Medical Committee of the Board of Health, the legislature has passed, and the governor has approved, a bill permitting the granting of physicians' licenses to adepts in the new art of treatment. Violet has the happiness of presenting to her sweetheart the first license under the new law.

MELIES.

WOOING THE SALESLADY (Jan. 15).—Oscar is in love with Kiki, a girl employed in the showrooms of Messrs. Lasson. He pays her a visit and is surprised by the return of the manager, whom he thought was at lunch. The girls disguise Oscar in feminine clothes, and tell the manager he is a new "trotter." He is sent with some hats to deliver to Madame Hammersmith, a manicurist, who insists upon treating the trotter kindly, and Oscar forgetting his identity unconsciously exposes his mustache to view. Madame Hammersmith incontinently subsides off her chair in a paroxysm of indignation, and Oscar takes a somersault through the open window to escape her incivilities. He makes his way back to the showroom, to find that the manicurist is already there, and has caused Kiki's dismissal. Oscar, with the gallantry which he alone knows so well how to display, assumes proprietorship over the tearful Kiki, and calmly informs the company at large that she is the future Mrs. Oscar Walker.

MONTE CRISTO UP TO DATE (Jan. 22).—Leo Martin, whose imagination has been stirred by reading that wonderful romance, "Monte Cristo," pays a visit to the little island, where is situated the Chateau d'If, the scene of that story. The custodian's daughter recognizes him as Mr. Martin of the fil-lums, and straightaway calls her mother, who is very much of a picture fan. The mother decides to conduct him on his literary pilgrimage.

But the custodian is a jealous husband, especially when he notices that literature plays only a second part with Martin and his own wife, so he takes the job out of his wife's hands and himself conducts the actor. Coming to the cell in which the old Abbe Faria suffered, he locks Leo in and returns home.

About eight o'clock that evening Milly finds Leo in his plight and her heart is softened. She brings a sumptuous meal, which she hands through the bars and the proper bedclothes for a comfortable night's rest. About twelve the custodian decides to see how Leo is "enjoying" himself. He unlocks the cell and is about to enter when Leo plays a trick that completely turns the tables on the jealous old keeper, in a way at which even the old boy himself has to laugh.

PATHEPLAY.

A TWO-FAMILY AFFAIR (Jan. 27).—The Smith boys are in love with the Brown girls, but find it difficult to see them often, as the mandates of stern parents keep them apart. Necessity being the mother of invention they decide to force an issue between the two old men and therefore write a letter to each of them over the signature of the other. The fake letter from Smith to Brown says that the writer does not consider the Brown girls fit company for his boys and for Brown to see they are kept at a distance. The other states that the good for nothing Smith boys are pestering the writer's daughters and that their attentions must stop.

The letters gain the desired effect and the irate old men on receiving them at once write each other that the writer expects to call in person and demand an apology. Learning this the boys at once prepare to bring matters to a climax. They make up very cleverly to represent the angry parents, the one to stay at home and impersonate Mr. Smith and the other to prepare to receive Mr. Smith at the Brown home as Mr. Brown. But well laid plans often go astray. The old gentlemen (who have never met) meet each other by chance and scrape an acquaintance. They become bosom friends over a little refreshment and on exchanging cards the plot is disclosed. Going to the Brown home they find both boys there in disguise and the mixup is finally explained and all is forgiven.

THE OASIS OF GABES (Tunis—Jan. 27).—A beautiful scenic showing the remarkable contrast between the burning sands of the desert and this highly cultivated garden spot. Luxuriant vegetation and sparkling streams are even more attractive in such surroundings. Interesting views of the city are also shown.

THE PATCHED ADONIS (Jan. 28).—Archibald is in love with the fair Gwendolyn, but her head is so full of the men of fiction, brawny and handsome demigods that she has no disposition to devote any of her heart to a merely average mortal. He calls upon her and is compelled to wait in the parlor for many weary moments while the fair lady is devouring the contents of one of her romances, oblivious of his call and forgetful of his existence.

In the meantime, George Benton is in despair of finding a perfect model for his painting of Adonis. Finally he is compelled to engage one man, an athlete, to pose for the body, another with a fine head of hair to supply the deficiency of the athlete in that respect, and still a third for a handsome face, since neither of the other two are gifted with beauty. The painting is finally finished and attracts much attention.

Gwendolyn, who is fond of art, goes to the exhibition in company with Archibald, and seeing on the canvas the idol of her dreams tells her lover that she will marry him if he will buy for her the picture. He does so, but when the picture arrives, jealous of her raptures over the perfect man, he determines to cure her. Learning the true secret of the model Adonis he arranges for Gwendolyn to meet "him." Going to the studio she sees the composite model, perfect only in parts, and cured of her folly awakes to the fact that her lover is really worthy of her regard.

THE POWER OF PRINT (Special—2 parts—Jan. 29).—Jessie, the daughter of the leader of the dominant party in city politics, receives a much coveted invitation to join a whist club favored by society. She becomes a constant attendant and as the play is for large stakes she soon becomes deeply in debt. Her father cannot help her as he has put every cent he has into the campaign, which will either make or break him.

Meanwhile Cartwright, the owner of one of the two leading newspapers of the city, is supporting Farnell's candidates in his paper. Meeting Jessie he becomes infatuated with her and under the pretense of business calls at the Farnell home every evening. Jessie, who personally cannot tolerate Cartwright, for the sake of her father dissembles her true feelings and hides her dislike. In a dishonorable manner Cartwright gets hold of a letter from Farnell to his daughter saying that his only hope is party success in the coming election, and with this knowledge determines to use it to his advantage to win Jessie.

At this juncture Bob Whitney returns home from college in disgrace, having been expelled not for innate wickedness, but sheer super-abundance of animal spirit. His angry father forbids him the house and tells him that until he has proved himself a man he will have nothing to do with him. Unknown in the city, Bob applies for a job as reporter on Cartwright's paper, where his inherited talent shows itself and soon raises him to the position of star reporter.

Cartwright to frighten Jessie into marrying him plans an expose of gambling among society and sends out Bob to dig up the facts at Jessie's whist club. Meeting Jessie he falls an instant victim to her charms and asks and receives her permission to call upon her. The elder Whitney seeing a statement in the rival paper, The Times, to the effect that its circulation surpasses that of The Star, his own paper, by 40,000, calls at the office of the Times to demand an explanation. While there he sees to his surprise his own son and is told that he is now their best reporter. Dumbfounded and proud of his son, he offers Bob a position as city editor on his own paper, which Bob at once accepts. Bob resigns from the Times at once and thereupon, of course, stops his investigation of society gambling, and plans to marry Jessie.

Cartwright in rage at the news determines to knife the Farnell candidates, but in a dramatic scene at the Farnell residence, Bob, with his fiancee beside him, tells him to do his worst as the support of his father's paper will be sufficient to make up for the defection.

SERINGAPATAM (Southern India—Jan. 29).—This ancient city is full of places interesting for historical associations, as well as for their beauty. Here are to be seen an old fort besieged by the English in 1768, a mosque said to have been built thousands of years ago and magnificent monuments of old time potentates.

THE LUNATIC'S CHILD (Special—2 parts—Jan. 31).—Peter and Jean Bourin, husband and wife, are itinerant basket makers living in a van. They are devoted to one another and happy with their baby, who is only a few months old. An accident cripples Peter and renders him helpless. One night the van catches fire and only Marie is able to escape with the child. Peter is burned to death and the crazed woman with her child, is brought to the nearest house, that of Frison, the miller and his wife. The Frisons have recently been entrusted with the care of the baby of the Demorins, a wealthy couple of the city, whose physician has recommended country air for the ailing child, and the Frisons as worthy to be trusted with its welfare.

While walking near the millrace with the child Madame Frison slips and the child being carelessly held, falls into the water and is swept away. Search fails to reveal the child and the woman and her husband are further distracted to receive a letter from the Demorins, saying that they have rented a house in the neighborhood and will arrive the next day. The unscrupulous Madame Frison remembers the poor, half crazed van dweller's wife and her baby, whom she has had driven from her house, and knows that the unfortunate woman has taken refuge in a shed in the forest near by. Madame Frison creeps up to the hut by night and while the mother sleeps, steals her child, which is of the same age and general appearance as the drowned Demorins' baby.

The rightful mother hunts frantically for her baby, and searches the village for it. Finally she recognizes it in the arms of Madame Demorin. She rushes up and claims it and being deemed dangerously mad by everyone, is sent to an asylum. Later discharged as cured, she seeks out Dr. Lemosin, who treated her burns and who is also the Demorins' physician. Her story soon convinces the doctor, and examining the supposed Demorin child, he finds the scars of the burn which identifies it as the Bourin baby. The deception is unmasked, but poor Jean, weakened by her troubles, succumbs to the shock of joy and dies.

BIOGRAPH.

THE SENTIMENTAL SISTER (Jan. 22).—When the austere father threatened the convent, it was too much for the older sister. There was only one way out—to leave home. In the city, her sentimental tendencies again came to the surface. Through them her younger sister was jeopardized. Pride and affection in conflict, there came the end of mere sentiment.

THE HUSBAND'S EXPERIMENT (Jan. 24).—Six months after the honeymoon the husband imagined his wife indifferent. Professor Von Tetter's statement that untried virtue is valueless, was the last straw to this incensed man. So to test the professor's theory, he left his wife in charge of a friend. Fiction and truth ran parallel. Reading "Don Quixote" on the way, made him decide. Well, he put an end to the test.

HIS FIREMAN'S CONSCIENCE (Jan. 26).—Engineer Daily is forced to discharge his fireman for habitual drunkenness. His young daughter, Rosana, wanders down to the tracks, and the door of the freight is closed upon her. She falls into the discharged fireman's hands. He is quite in love with her, and when he learns whose daughter she is, concludes to keep her from the exasperated parents. That's where his conscience came in, leading to regeneration and better days.

THE FALLEN ANGEL (Jan. 31).—Believing her lost to him, the artist paints the ideal of the woman he reveres. Through the passing years, his painted conception becomes his one inspiration. They meet again, she, the fallen angel. Yet from out the bondage of the past, rises the woman she might have been.

OUT OF SIGHT, OUT OF MIND (Jan. 29).—This production might be termed a comedy travelogue, showing scenes in New York and California. The story tells of a young man of fickle nature, who, having to leave his sweetheart in New York for a business trip to Southern California, becomes smitten with a pretty senorita in the land of sunshine and flowers, with disastrous results.

"Good gracious, dear," says ma one morning to pa, "you must buy some woolen underwear." So absent-minded pa makes a note on his cuff: "Buy wool underclothes." William thinks he has a tip and makes a plunge in wool. There is quite a flutter for a while. Then pa's wealthy friends take the tip, too, and wool goes up a-soaring.

THE SHADOW OF GUILT (Special—2 parts—Jan. 26).—To atone for the ruin and death of Arnold's father, for which he was responsible, Van Dam, a millionaire, takes the young man into his employ as private secretary. Arnold plans to marry Emily, his employer's niece, knowing she is Van Dam's heiress. Emily, however, loves Doane, a young broker, and turns a deaf ear to Arnold's avowals. Van Dam, who favors his secretary's suit, learns of this with anger. Later, the millionaire discovers the love affair between Doane and his niece. He orders the boy from the house. Emily declares her determination to stand by her sweetheart and leaves with him. In rage, Van Dam destroys the will leaving his fortune to Emily and makes out another in favor of Arnold. Due to the millionaire's influence, Doane is ruined. He and his bride are thrown into poverty. Later, Emily begs her uncle for assistance, but the man rebuffs her.

Anxious to get hold of the fortune, Arnold attempts to poison the millionaire. His plot is discovered, just as Van Dam is about to go abroad. In desperation, Arnold tells the man and imprisons him in the garret of the mansion, after which he announces that Van Dam has left the country. Later, news is received that the vessel on which the millionaire is supposed to have sailed, foundered with all hands. Doane and Emily are summoned to hear the will read. They learn that Arnold has been bequeathed the entire fortune. Up in the garret, meanwhile, Van Dam accidentally sets fire to the building in an effort to escape. Doane learns of the man's peril. Dashing through the flames, he rescues the millionaire. Arnold, who attempts to interfere, is felled to the floor. Although badly burnt, Doane and Van Dam emerge from the house in safety. Arnold revives, but finds himself entrapped in a seething inferno. In the midst of his frantic efforts to escape, the roof collapses and buries the miserable wretch beneath a mass of blazing timbers.

THE MASQUERADERS (Special—2 parts—Jan. 28).—At the instigation of Sybel, an adventuress, Black, a society parasite, steals a valuable diamond brooch. He turns the jewel over to the adventuress, who then throws him over. Black flees from the city to escape arrest. Shortly afterward, the young man meets and falls in love with Mildred. Because of the opposition of Mildred's father, the lovers elope and hasten to a justice of the peace to be married. Fate intervenes. Sybel, who has just arrived in the city, is arrested and brought before the same justice. Facing a term in prison, Sybel determines to make Black share it with her. She denounces the young man who is placed under arrest. Mildred is heartbroken. Several years later, Mildred falls in love with Gerald, a young broker, and consents to be his wife. Black is released from prison. Unable to find work, he decides to return to crime. Sloane, an unscrupulous lawyer, gets possession of letters sent to Mildred by Black before the latter's arrest. He tries to blackmail the girl.

Mildred and Gerald attend a masquerade ball. Black, lurking in the vicinity, sees his former sweetheart enter the house in which the affair is being held. Sloane arrives and later Black overhears the scoundrel threaten Mildred with exposure unless she buys him off. Black waits until Sloane emerges from the house. He holds the man up and secures the letters. Donning his mask, the ex-convict enters the building and mixes with the masqueraders. Finding Mildred, he quietly places the compromising letters in her hand. Before the girl can discover his identity, the criminal departs. Black wanders aimlessly until he is miles from the city. The thought of what might have been fills him with the resolution to turn over a new leaf. Throwing back his shoulders, Black vows to be worthy of the love and trust which Mildred had once placed in him.

THE MEDICINE SHOW AT STONE GULCH (Jan. 30).—Connem and Pearl open a medicine show at Stone Gulch. Connem's voice and Pearl's clog dance attract a crowd. After the performance, the fakir offers for sale his liniment, which he guarantees to cure everything from smallpox to the itch.

Jim, a cowboy, buys a bottle of the liniment after Connem has rubbed some of it on his lame back. Although the stuff almost kills him, Jim vows that it has done him a world of good. The result is that the "medicine" sells like hot cakes.

The following morning finds Jim unable to leave his bunk. His comrades find that his back is like a piece of raw beef as the result of Connem's liniment. Vowing vengeance, they leave for the hotel where the fakir is stopping. Connem and Pearl see them approaching. Dashing up to their room, the fakirs dress up two dummies in their clothes, after which they dive out of the window and drop to the top of a freight train passing below.

The infuriated cowboys burst into the room. They assault the dummies and learn of their mistake. Rushing to the window they see Connem and Pearl riding toward the next town atop of the freight train. While the cowboys rage, the fakirs munch on a couple of sandwiches which Connem has fished out of his pockets.

MAKING HIGH-GRADE PAPER (Jan. 30).—Of absorbing interest is this feature, which shows how paper is made. To get this picture, a photographer went through the mills where one of the most famous brands of writing paper is manufactured.

Rags are the materials from which the very best paper is made. These are first washed and shredded. The "batch" is then thrown into a tank, where, by the aid of chemicals, it is reduced to a pulp. The processes which follow show how this pulp is calendeded, water-marked, etc.

PLAYING FOR A FORTUNE (Jan. 31).—O'Sullivan, a policeman, is in love with Nora. Steve, the girl's brother, is a member of a gang of river pirates. Coming upon Nora conversing with O'Sullivan, he orders the girl into the house. Jim, leader of the gang, also loves Nora and warns the officer to keep away. The gang learns that a bag of pearls worth a fortune is in the possession of the captain of the schooner "Santa Rosa." Steve compels Nora to go aboard the vessel and ascertain the location of the captain's cabin. By pretending to be a fruit peddler, Nora gets the information desired by the gang. The girl is then ordered to entice O'Sullivan into the house and keep him there until after the raid. Jim and his men leave. Shortly afterward, O'Sullivan passes Nora's house and is persuaded to enter. His suspicions are aroused, however, and he leaves a few moments later. He learns of the raid and phones for help.

The pirates overpower the crew of the schooner. Jim and Steve enter the cabin and subdue the skipper, but not until Steve is shot in the arm. The thieves find the pearls. The officers descend upon the "Santa Rosa" and engage in a hot battle with the pirates. Steve and Jim get away. They are seen by O'Sullivan, who follows. The thieves burst into the house where Nora attends to her brother's wound. O'Sullivan is seen approaching. Jim is about to shoot at the officer, but Nora persuades the leader and her brother to hide in a closet. O'Sullivan enters the room. He demands to know the hiding place of the two pirates. Meanwhile, Jim's hatred of the policeman masters him. Bursting out of the closet he shoots. The bullet goes wild and kills Steve. A moment later, the murderer is arrested. Freed from her brother's baneful influence, Nora marries O'Sullivan. As his wife, she enters upon the dawn of a new life.

Mack, a moral weakling, nurses a bitter hatred for his successful rival and takes the opportunity to comprise him in the eyes of the girl. Hopeless and without funds, Nora goes to work in a factory. Of an afternoon Duffy and Mack meet and Duffy learns that Nora is at work. He upbraids Mack for allowing it and Mack, sufficiently drunk to be affected, resolves to make Nora quit. He enters the factory and has trouble with the superintendent. Mack is ejected from the room in which Nora is working and Nora is sent into the stock room. In the course of putting the drunken man out of the building, Mack pulls down some electric wires, causing a short circuit at the fuse and a fire.

While the superintendent is gone for the police, Mack goes to sleep in his office. The fire alarm is given and all, except Nora, rush out of the building. In the excitement she is locked in the stock room. When the fire department arrives smoke is pouring from all the windows. Nora opens the stock room window and calls for help, then falls unconscious upon the window sill. Duffy is upon the roof. His companions lower him over the edge of the building by the heels. He takes the girl and throws her in the life net held below then pumps himself. The superintendent now recognizes that Mack is in his office. The entire building is aflame, but Duffy fights his way through the burning corridors and carries the unconscious Mack from the place. Mack regains consciousness, but is mortally burned. Bob sinks lower; he becomes a habitue of low dives and saloons. Roger Newton, the successful novelist, is now engaged in writing a novel entitled "The Tramp." He is also paying attentions to Pearl and they are practically engaged. Newton decides to go into the slums to get atmosphere. He finds his way into a saloon where Bob is playing the piano for drinks. Later, Bob saves Newton from assault. Newton, in gratitude, takes Bob home and sets him up as his secretary. Bob meets Pearl and attempts to bring about a reconciliation. Pearl refuses. This is observed by Newton who, failing to understand, grows jealous. Later Newton falls sick and is unable to finish his novel. Bob, returning home, learns of the trouble and takes it upon himself to finish it. A check comes from the publishers for $1,200 with a note saying that the last installment was the best ever. Newton investigates and finds that Bob did the work. Bob refuses the money his friend offers and congratulates both Newton and Pearl on their coming marriage.

FRONTIER.

SLIM AND THE DYNAMITERS (Jan. 29).—Molly turns Slim down in favor of Desperate Dan. Slim swears vengeance, and not only beats up Rattlesnake Pete, Dan's henchman, but he also purloins Dan's equipage and abducts Molly. Desperate Dan learns of the outrage, mounts his loyal satellite and gives pursuit. Slim is overtaken. Dan regains possession of the girl and takes her to an old hut.

But Slim still pursues and again he is captured. He is taken into a cabin and tied to a keg of dynamite. Slim bursts his bonds and, unmindful of the power of the fuse, rolls the keg out of the cabin and down the road. He hurls the keg away from him, and it lands in the arms of Desperate Dan. Dan throws it to Haggard Harriet, who in turn passes it to Rattlesnake Pete. Pete gives it a violent toss and there is a terriffic explosion. Molly, meanwhile, has escaped and notified the Jagville police force, who hurry to the rescue. The villains land in the arms of the law, and Slim in the arms of Molly.

THE TURNING POINT (Jan. 31).—Frank and Bert are rivals for the hand of Nell. Bert, recognized by the sheriff as a wanted man, is placed under arrest. Frank is accepted by Nell, and the two are married. A year passes. Bert is released from prison and returns home, only to have the memory of Nell haunting him constantly. He goes to the cabin of Nell and Frank, finds her alone, and endeavors to make love to her. She resents and in the struggle that ensues she receives a long scratch on the cheek. But she succeeds in obtaining his gun and ordering him from the house. Frank returns, asks her how she received the scratch and when she tells him that the baby did it, he becomes suspicious.

Bert realizes that if Frank should find his gun trouble would follow. He employs Pedro, a Mexican, to leave a note where Frank will be certain to find it, to the effect that he, Bert, will meet Nell at the well at two o'clock. Frank finds the note and goes to the well. Bert then returns to Nell's home. Frank hears her screams and runs back. He enters the house and the two men fight. The stove is overturned, and the house catches fire. Nell seies the little baby and rushes outside, just in time to prevent Pedro from shooting in the window at her husband. As the men are fighting inside, one of their guns is discharged and the bullet, going through the window, wounds Pedro. The sheriff and posse arrive just in time to rescue Frank from the burning house, which collapses, burying Bert with it.

JOKER.

A FREAK TEMPERANCE WAVE (Jan. 28).—Max is a hard drinker. His wife is a hard worker. Bob emulates Max in courting John Barleycorn and the two are hale companions. Max's wife sets the temperance union workers upon her thirsty husband. Max is incorrigible and the temperance people give up in disgust. A circus comes to town. The town people attend with the exception of Max and Bob, who are too busy with the demon rum. During the show trouble brews. The tent catches fire and the audience, show people and animals all run out.

Max and Bob are "four sheets in the wind" when an elephant forces its way into the saloon. Both men think they have the D. T.'s and beat it. Once in the street they come face to face with a bear. They turn in another direction and the snake charmer, her pet coiled around her, falls upon Max's neck. When he breaks wildly away from her, he encounters the human skeleton. More dead than alive, Max reaches home with Bob and both sign the pledge of the temperance union.

IN THE YEAR 2014 (Jan. 31).—On this certain afternoon in the year 2014, Mrs. Jones, and her daughter, stock brokers, advertise for a first-class stenographer. Charles Van Duzen, a defenseless young man, striving to make a livelihood in the big city, and at the same time retain his good name, calls on Jones' daughter, and is at once accepted as the new stenographer. He has not been there long, however, when Mrs. Jones takes advantage of his inocence, and makes improper advances to him. Howbeit, he gives her to understand at once that he is a good man and will not flirt. The office girl, from her lowly position in life, looks up to and idolizes the beautiful steno, but believes that he would never listen to such love as hers.

However, in the sanctity of his heart, Charles is certain he loves the office girl, and only hopes that she will have the courage to propose to him.

At the moment when both Jones and her daughter each believe herself the accepted suitor of Charles, the office girl is made courageous by desperation. She asks Charles if he will marry hr. He drops his eyes—a rosy blush creeps to his cheek, and he allows his head to be drawn to the office girl's bosom. She leads the blushing groom to a nearby church, where they are married.

BISON.

THE MAD HERMIT (Three parts—Jan. 31).—Gray is a scout. He and his wife are traveling West with other settlers and soldiers. It is Gray who has the tragic fight with the Indian, which results in the loss of his memory. Gray slinks away into the mountains, attended by the sister of the Indian he fought, who has taken a fancy to him. Later, this squaw falls in love with Gray and guards him jealousy.

Time passes on. Gray's wife, Grace, forgets him in the good time she is having at the Fort flirting with the officers, and in particular with Lieutenant Lloyd. He proposes to her and she, thinking her husband dead, accepts.

Time comes when miners and others complain of a bad man who throws rocks at them and seems impervious to their shots. Soldiers are sent to get this fellow, but he manages to drop from a tree upon a prospector and escape. Many times the soldiers and miners try to get him, but fail.

Grace's wedding day arrives. She and Lloyd walk in the woods. Lloyd returns to the Fort for a few moments and it is during his absence that Grace comes face to face with the famous "Mad Hermit"—her husband. She backs off, horrified. When Grace goes, the squaw approaches Gray, whose memory is returning through the meeting with his wife. Gray returns to his cave to gather his wits and the Indian follows, angered.

Grace seeks her room in terror. She takes a revolver and goes into the woods again to kill the man who once loved her. She fails when Gray comes upon her suddenly; she returns to the house and starts to dress for the wedding. That night Gray follows and enters her room. Alone, he is confronted with Lloyd, and a terrific fight ensues. The squaw, furious with jealousy, sees a shadow from the outside and shoots. Lloyd staggers into the room to lift Grace, but is pushed aside by Gray, who tenderly lifts the woman and starts away with her, laughing wildly at Lloyd and the assembled guests.

POWERS.

THE SAINT AND THE SINGER (Jan. 26).—The sanctimonious Mr. Smith is invited by his fellow clerks to attend a stag supper at a club. He refuses, saying that he wouldn't think of doing anything of this sort. However that night his friends call for him, deceive Mrs. Smith as to where they are going, and take Smith to the supper.

Smith drinks too much. He reaches home and manages to get into bed without awakening his wife. The next morning his wife suspects him, but he swears to her that he left the club supper without taking a drink, that on the way home he was attacked and beaten up by two men.

At this critical moment, Mrs. Smith observes two red marks on his forehead, left there by the lips of a cabaret dancer. The wife believes the marks to be blood, and sends for a doctor. To keep up the imposition, Smith is compelled to lie abed for a week with his head in an ice pack.

A COINCIDENTAL BRIDEGROOM (Jan. 30).—Hal is the type of weak man who allows himself to drift with the current of events. On the other hand, Edwin, his roommate, has a strong character, but is dissolute, and lacks the gentle influence of the right woman to set him straight. Hal is mixed up in a love affair not to his credit. He meets Ethel in the woods and promises to marry her when she can arrange to leave home without causing suspicion. Later she writes to Hal, telling him: "Come to me Thursday, at 11 P. M., and you can right the wrong you have done. Touch the button to the right of the front door bell and the door will open automatically."

This letter is intercepted by her father and mother. The father concludes that there will be no mistake—that he will force the evil-doer to marry and save the good name of his daughter. The letter is sent. The father hires two private detectives and a minister to assist him. Ignorant that her letter has been intercepted, the girl prepares for the elopement. That night, Hal is exposed to his fellow club members as a thief, and makes an end of his worthless life. Edwin, going home partially intoxicated, sees two crooks hiding in his path. As he has no revolver, he steps to the nearest porch. The crooks pursue. He leans against the door frame and the door opens. He steps inside and closes the door. Once inside, he begins to explore the house. The lights are flashed on. Edwin is confronted by an old man, who tells him that he has been expected—that this is his wedding night. He is confronted with Ethel and she swears that he is the wrong man. The father will not believe her.

Finally Edwin consents and the ceremony is performed. A morning paper tells of the suicide of

A BLOWOUT AT SANTA BANANA (2 parts—Jan. 26).—Wall-Eyed Pete, Curly Whiskerlegs and Rattlesnake Pete, known as the three guardsmen, get in bad with three pretty waitresses by misinterpreting the girls' request of the amorous trio that they "ask aunt first." They ask the unattractive aunts and are accepted at the aunts. To escape the aunts, they eagerly accept the job of driving 60 miles across the desert to Tombstone, to fetch a ton of fireworks for the projected Fourth of July celebration at Santa Banana. The Amusement Committee warns them that they must not waste the city's funds on liquor and gambling.

Arriving in Tombstone, they protect one another from the allurements of rye and poker, and start home with the fireworks, after the storekeeper, has smuggled a demijohn aboard with his compliments. The guardsmen are warned by Capt. Wheeler's Raugers that the bandits are on the road. In a gulch the outfit is overtaken by twenty bandits. After a fight the guardsmen are captured. The bandits discover the firewater and hold an orgie around the campfire close to the explosives. That night Wall-Eyed Pete wheedles the lone guard into letting him smoke a cheroot. With it he burns the thongs from Curly's wrists, and, after setting fire to the wagon, they escape on one horse. The air is filled with a dazzling pyrotechnic display, which drives the drunken bandits in every direction.

Next day the three guardsmen meet the rangers and send them back after the bandits. Meantime, at Santa Banana the Fourth of July celebration languishes, the crowd loudly demanding fireworks as advertised. The Committee, deciding that the guardsmen are off on a drunk, send a gun-man after them. He brings them in. Their tale of heroic daring is scoffed at. On the plea that the three guardsmen owe it to the town to make good by furnishing some sort of celebration, the Committee on Amusements decide to lynch them "to make a Roman holiday."

The three bellicose aunts rush to the rescue of the unhappy heroes. Thus intimidated, the Committee gallantly waive the point, confer with the parson and decide to change the punishment. The horrified guardsmen are given their choice of marrying the aunts on the spot or being lynched. After a vain appeal to the still haughty girls, the boys ungallantly chose hanging, whereupon the outraged aunts attack the guardsmen. The nieces start to interpose but the ruction is interrupted by the entrance of Wheeler's rangers, bringing a string of captive bandits, who make signs that they still see sky-rockets and pin wheels.

Explanations and apologies follow, and the boys are hailed as heroes. The girls relent and the right sort of wedding ensues, to the huge delight of the whole assembled population of Santa Banana.

CALAMITY ANNE IN SOCIETY (Jan. 31).—One day while Calamity Anne is standing in front of her shack, Tommy nibbling grass at her feet, a lawyer comes up and informs her that Miss Ann Thompson is heiress to a large estate. Calamity claims to be the heiress and is overjoyed at her good fortune. She bids farewell to the cowboys and goes to claim the estate.

She arrives and is met by her uncle's two lawyers, who escort her and Tommy to the estate. Calamity is much impressed by the vastness of her fortune and when the lawyers suggest that she go into society, she assents readily and employs a social secretary to smooth the way for her.

Calamity rides about the grounds of her estate on Tommy, the irate footman trotting at Tommy's heels. The servants are nearly all driven to rebellion by her rough manner.

At dinner one night, Calamity, looking out of the window, sees a ragged boy feeding Tommy grass. Just then the gardener enters and knocks the boy down and beats Tommy. Calamity immediately rushes out and discharges the man on the spot. To reward the boy, she makes him Tommy's valet. The boy tells her that his mother is the washerwoman on her estate and when Calamity sees the poor woman hard at work her heart is touched and she invites both the woman and boy to dine with her. This aggravates the servants very much.

In the meantime, the social secretary arrives and plans a brilliant social campaign for Calamity Anne. She sends out invitations to a banquet. Calamity secures several of the invitations and sends same to her cowboy friends back home.

The day of the dinner arrives. Calamity is coached carefully by the social secretary on etiquette, and is forced by her to wear the most modern gowns. The guests arrive. Calamity meets them all heartily in her uncouth, western way. The guests, however, are shocked at her boisterousness and the social secretary prods Calamity at each fresh "break." Calamity, imbibing too much of the liquid refreshment, becomes so boisterous that the guests are about to leave. At this point, the cowboys, whom Calamity invited, arrive, and cause great consternation. This shock is soon followed by another. Her supposed uncle's two lawyers arrive and inform her that she is not the rightful heiress, and they bring forth the real heiress to the estates. Calamity, however, whose shoes have been tight and whose thirst for society has been quenched, is more than willing to relinquish her claim on the estates in exchange for her old clothes.

Calamity, Tommy and the cowboys are last seen walking slowly over the trail toward their dear western home.

THANHOUSER.

TURKEY TROT TOWN (Jan. 18).—The tango craze seems to be on the increase, and in the mythical city of Tango Town the inhabitants danced not only at receptions and restaurants, but in every phase of business and pleasure. This story tells of a happening in that city when a tired business man became a hero man and a girl found it easier to dance into trouble than to tango gracefully out of it.

HER LOVE LETTERS (Jan. 20).—The broker was happily married and fond of his wife and their little girl. No shadow had darkened their life until the time when it became necessary for the wife to sail abroad to attend the bedside of her dying mother. Business prevented the husband from going with her, and he and their child remained in their American home.

Some days later news was received that the liner had been burned at sea, and his wife was not one of the few survivors. It was a terrible blow to the husband, but worse followed. One morning he decided to go over her desk, which as she had frequently told him, laughingly, contained her only secrets. He had never presumed to disturb it before and tears came to his eyes when he found there old love letters he had written, and little tokens he had given her, but in a secret drawer he discovered a number of love letters which had not been written by him, and were only signed with the name "Henry," and addressed to "Sweetheart." At first the husband was wild with rage, but then he decided that for his little girl's sake that the secret must be kept. The problem became more serious, however, when, some time later, the wife returned to her home with a few survivors. She had been picked up by a sailing vessel after several days of suffering torture in an open boat. The husband greeted her lovingly, because others were about, but privately determined to leave her forever. The pretext he used was that he was about to go on a long business journey, but unfortunately the wife saw the letter before he departed, and was able, in a novel way, to convince her husband of her innocence. Thus was the family reunited, for the woman freely forgave her husband, at first for the sake of their child, and later because she realized the trial he had undergone.

THE ELUSIVE DIAMOND (Jan. 23).—The favorite niece of a wealthy widow was about to be married, and the widow determined to give the younger woman an extremely valuable present, so she selected a noted diamond, which was in her collection, and gave it to her companion, a bright girl, with instructions to carry it to the niece's suburban home. The companion realized that her mission was an important one and her suspicions were aroused by the strange conduct of the butler, a man she never liked, consequently, before departing on her mission, she took pains to securely hide the diamond intrusted to her care. The butler, who was on the watch, was convinced that it was hidden in her hair, and so notified an accomplice of his who was waiting for the girl in the suburban town to which she was sent.

When the young woman arrived she was met by the accomplice, who explained that he had been sent by his employer (the niece), to take her to the niece's home. The girl did not suspect anything, and almost before she knew it, was a prisoner in a deserted house and a demand was made upon her for the jewel. Before she could be stopped, she threw the jewel case, which was concealed in her hair, out of the wondow, and the butler's accomplice and his wife wasted much valuable time hunting for it. The wife searched the girl and her belongings and was thoroughly convinced that the ring was not there, so both believed it was lying somewhere on the grass outside of the house.

The girl escaped by a clever trick, and before the captors could realize it she was back with a couple of officers of the law and they were promptly arrested; then, for the first time, they found that the jewel had been in their possession right along, but they did not know it. It was carefully concealed in the cake of soap which was among the toilet articles in the young woman's hand bag, and they never thought of looking for it there, so the companion saved the jewel and gladly assisted in sending the butler to the penitentiary, where they belonged, while her mistress thanked her stars that her companion was the one person who knew how to care for an Elusive Diamond.

MAJESTIC.

WHAT THE CRYSTAL TOLD (Jan. 18).—Jane, a young girl employed in a department store, attended a public dance, and there met Dan Mullen, a ward heeler. Dan paid considerable attention to her and made a great impression upon her. Jane at first refused to take anything but soft drinks, but finally Dan prevailed upon her to drink liquor and soon she entered into the spirit of the evening.

Early the next morning, weary and disillusioned, she crept back to her home, but her father ordered her away, never to return. Separated from her family the girl appealed to Dan, but he laughed at her heartlessly and told him it was none of his concern.

The years sped by, and the ward heeler became the boss of his party. His elevation to the proud position was accompanied by acts which were distinctly dishonest, and an alert district attorney strove to secure evidence that would bring him to justice. Several of Dan's henchmen were convicted and sent to prison, and the Boss became seriously worried. His mind was naturally superstitious, and he decided to consult a Hindoo fortune teller.

He did not recognize the veiled figure in the darkened room, but the Mystic, none other than the little shop girl of years ago, knew him instantly. She realized that in his frightened condition she could easily worm out his secrets, and told him to call the next day.

At the next seance the mystic told the Boss many wonderful things, and, before he suspected it, he told her secrets which would send him to prison if known to the district attorney. Then she told him to gaze into a large crystal ball, and as he looked, scene after scene appeared, showing the suffering he had caused Jane. The last scene in the crystal showed him looking at a crystal, a gypsy beside him. She threw off her veil and he recognized Jane. With a cry of alarm he sprang to his feet and confronted the gypsy, who had thrown off her veil and gazed at him with a mocking smile? He turned to flee from the house, but detectives burst in from the adjoining room and placed him under arrest. To his horror he learned that a dictograph had been placed in concealment and every word he had said had been taken down by a stenographer. It meant a long term in prison to him, but to the woman who watched him triumphantly, it meant revenge.

THE RING (Jan. 20).—When the coming marriage of those of social prominence is announced, the newspapers herald it widely, but the mating of factory toilers, while fully as important to the nation, is regarded as of little moment.

The engagement of Maggie Gallagher to Dan Maher, was in the latter class. They worked in the same factory, lived on the same street, and had known each other since childhood. When he asked the question which millions of young men had asked before him, she gave a happy consent, and was as fully satisfied as if Dan had been a millionaire instead of merely a factory hand.

The question of an engagement ring proved a serious problem to the groom elect. His savings were small and the price asked for even very modest rings was almost prohibitive to him. Providence seemed to smile upon him when he found a handsome diamond ring upon the sidewalk. Ignorant of its value, he decided that no harm would be done by keeping it and presenting it to Maggie, and so, unwittingly, he started trouble for himself.

The owner of the ring advertised for it, offering a reward, and the advertisement chanced to be read by Nora Kelly, who had vainly endeavored to ensnare handsome Dan. Nora was angry, and in her rage did something which she bitterly regretted. She had seen Dan find the ring, and going to the owner, she told the lady that Dan had stolen it. Dan was arrested, charged with the theft of the ring and locked up.

After the momentary feeling of joy Nora felt keen pangs of remorse. The sight of Maggie, her successful rival, bravely trying to keep back the tears as she worked at her machine, was more than she could bear. She went to Mrs. Gerard, the owner of the ring, and told her that Dan was guiltless of all wrong. He was released at once, and Nora was forgiven for the trouble she had caused. The ring, while apparently causing misfortune to come to Dan, really brought luck to him, for Mrs. Gerard, interested herself in the affairs of the young couple, and Maggie soon became Mrs. Dan Maher.

THE POWER OF THE MIND (Jan. 24).—Henry Graham is paralyzed by a fall when alighting from his automobile. His doctor is a friend of the family. Henry, observing the family picture the doctor makes with his wife and little daughter, and realizing his own helplessness now, decides to bring a possible romance between his wife and the doctor, and begins to abuse her. The doctor is a constant caller. Grace tells him of Henry's change of nature, and says it is because Henry hasn't enough comforts, and wishes she could help increase their income. The doctor suggests a play. She writes it. They keep it from Henry. They read and discuss the play together. Henry mistakes their constant interest for success of his plan, and so records in his diary.

The play is accepted by a friend of the doctor's. Rehearsals begin. The doctor escorts Grace to and from rehearsals in his auto. Grace gets an attendant for Henry, as she must be away. When she is at rehearsal one day, Henry bribes the unscrupulous attendant to get him poison. The doctor and Grace return in time for the doctor to catch and prevent the attendant from giving Henry the poison bottle. Doctor discharges the attendant. They tell Grace that Henry discharged him because he preferred not to be bothered with an attendant.

The night of the play arrives. Grace tearfully departs with the doctor. Henry records in his diary that his evenings are the doctor's now, and that love is drawing them onward, and that her tears were from her conscience, that he can no longer wait the inevitable. The doctor, in picking up Helen to carry her on his shoulder as he departs with Grace, drops his revolver. Henry covers it with paper from his couch. They leave, and Henry secures the gun. The attendant watches Grace and the doctor go, and sees his chance for revenge; he turns burglar. As Henry is about to shoot himself, after Helen is abed, and after he has burned the leaves of his diary, he hears the attendant entering the house; he phones the theater with the extension phone his wife placed by his bed. The attendant enters little Helen's room and she screams. Henry hearing the screams, forgets his paralysis—rises—totters from the room and grapples with the burglar attendant in Helen's room. FOOLING UNCLE (Jan. 21).—Peggy and Harry are in love, but as Harry's financial condition is dependent on the whims of the uncle, an extremely cross old man, he must first gain uncle's consent to the marriage. He shows uncle a photograph of Peggy, which so impresses him that he has Harry bring Peggy to call on him. When she arrives, she flirts with and flatters uncle until he tries himself to make love to her. He calls at her home and proposes. Harry overhears and is indignant and when uncle has gone, chides Peggy for accepting uncle. She tells him she will lead uncle such a chase that uncle will gladly buy her off.

Uncle gives an announcement dinner and Peggy starts on her campaign; she insults the guests and cavorts around to such an extent that uncle is furious, but she pets him and soon gets him into good humor again. After dinner she suggests making a night of it. Uncle against his will, is dragged to a roof garden cafe, where Peggy rags with him until the old man is about dead, when she steps upon his gouty foot. Harry is seated at another table and when a friend of uncle's comes in and is introduced to Peggy, uncle hobbles over to Harry and calls him aside. He offers a large sum if Harry will marry Peggy, but Harry declines until uncle has reached quite a large figure. He still says "No," but tells Peggy to start up—Peggy does. She sings at the top of her voice and the old man hearing it, raises his finger to Harry's satisfaction and Harry agrees. Peggy and Harry take the old man home and after turning him over to his valet give themselves up to the anticipation of future bliss.

THE HIDDEN CLUE (Jan. 24).—Perkins & Company, appraisers and gem cutters, receive from J. Lang, a diamond importer, seven large uncut rubies and a letter asking for appraisal of same. While Perkins is examining the rubies, Budd Manners, a crook, enters and tries to dispose of some small gems. His avarice is aroused as he sees the rubies and he decides to steal them. That night Ashley, Perkins' foreman, is working alone in the office. He hears Budd and other crooks breaking in and 'phones to the police. Then, thinking the police might not arrive in time, he hides the gems in a jar on the desk, then hastily writes the following figures as a clue to where he had secreted the gems. No. 99c 8: /@4 9: %$3c. He puts up a desperate fight as the crooks enter, but they kill him and search in vain for the jewels. They hear the police coming and run off empty handed. Next morning Perkins puts the case in the hands of private detectives. Dick Henshaw and May Preston, the detectives, try hard to solve the mystery and are about to give up in despair when Mary discovers the figures and punctuation marks that Ashley wrote, correspond with certain letters on the keyboard of the typewriter. She writes the letters instead of the figures and gets the key to the mystery. They now understand that the figures read "Look in Jar on Desk." They go to the office to recover the gems. Budd and his pals, knowing that the gems must still be in the office, return to find them and are captured by the two detectives. The detectives get a big reward for the capture of the murderers of Ashley and the recovery of the gems.

HIS TWIN SOUL (Jan. 2).—Have you ever had a "double?" If you have, you will admit that it can land you in some awful messes. In this funny story we have a Mr. Spark, who has a "double" in the person of Mr. Lark. Now Mr. Spark belongs to the genus Vertigus Aries, which being rendered into common or garden English reads, "giddy goat," while Mr. Lark is a sedate and proper stick-in-the-mud, with a highly respectable wife. Mr. Spark fixes up with his summer girl, one Dolly Lightfoot, a fascinating damsel, all fluff and frillikins, to take her out for a nice little supper at a secluded restaurant. She arrives first on the scene, and sees to her amaement her inamorata sitting at a table with a lady, and a frump at that. This leads to ructions, and Mr. Lark, his spouse and Dolly leave the house. Spark enters, and, taken by the waiters for the absconded Mr. Lark, is presented with a stiff bill, which he is asked to meet on the spot. He declines and does a slope. A wild chase ensues, and Spark only succeeds in avoiding capture by hiding in an antique wardrobe which is standing outside a dealer's. Meanwhile Mr. Lark has had a very rough time with his better half, and to appease her wrath purchases the antique wardrobe. It is conveyed to his house, and in a touching speech he presents it to his wife. She opens the door, and out jumps to her amazement, her husband's "double," who has so inadvertently been the cause of all the trouble.

This leads him into the hands of a practical joker, who sells him a compass, and tells him to follow wherever the needle points. Bill has a lively time of it while trying to keep to the straight path. Houses have to be gone through, brick walls have to be passed through, and still Bill does not waver in his determination to follow the needle.

THE LAWYER'S COURTSHIP (Jan. 15).—Ploche, the lawyer, has been courting Miss Laura Foot for ten long years. It was more probable that another ten years would have drifted along but for the arrival of Yvonne and Martha. These wide-awake young ladies at once saw how matters stood and Martha quickly conceived a plan. She determined to make the lawyer flirt with her. Within a fortnight Ploche had blossomed out into a gay spark, the clerks in the office wondering what had come over their employer. Things progressed even better than the girls had hoped, and when Yvonne saw that the moment had arrived to take a hand in the game, surprised Ploche and her sister spooning. She demanded to know why he dared to flirt with her sister after he had monopolized her cousin's affections for so many years. The girl suggested that there was only one course left open to him: he must marry Laura. Their scheme was successful, and the two timid creatures at last resolved to get married.

OSCAR'S HEROIC POSES (Jan. 20).—Oscar is in love with Miss Genevieve Barry, a young lady with rather romantic tendencies. In order to impress her Oscar induces the Gaumont Company to cinematograph him in various heroic poses. When he projects the film on the screen at Montclair House he straightway leaps into favor with Miss Genevieve, and monopolizes her society, to the great displeasure of a certain young gentleman, who has views of his own with regard to Genevieve, and decided opinions concerning Oscar's "bravery." When Oscar subsequently makes an appointment with the fair damsel, which the ignored follower gets wind of, this latter gentleman simply appears as the spectre of Montclair in the moonlight—what time Oscar is meeting Genevieve on the west terrace. The threatening aspect of the white apparition is too much for Oscar, the hero of the hundred fights—and he skedaddles, leaving the winsome Miss Barry in the comforting arms of the more constant lover.

GREAT NORTHERN SPECIAL FEATURE.

THE WHITE GHOST (Four parts).—Erik, the son of Count Bille, and Eva, the winsome daughter of Lawson, the surveyor on his estate, are lovers. Count Bille is fond of wordly indulgences, but, at the same time, is quietly submissive to his sister, Ulrica, a termagant. The count, prompted by his sister, tries to effect an alliance between his son and Lady Vera Torp, daughter of his friend, but Erik has ideas of his own on the point and shows a marked preference for Eva. Aunt Ulrica observes Erik go off to meet Eva, and sends the count after him on horseback to put an end to their romance. Erik informs Eva of his father's plans and his determination not to submit to them, but as they are riding together along a country road they meet Eva's father, and he informs them that he has just left the count, who has forbidden the girl to meet his son again. The next day Lady Vera calls at the house, and the count and his sister contrive to leave Erik alone with her, in the hope that the plans for their union may mature. Instead, Erik confesses to Vera his love for the surveyor's daughter, and earnestly pleads with her to help him by telling the count that Vera herself has no wish to marry Erik. Vera consents. The count arranges a shooting party, and after which we are led back to his domicile, where a reception and dinner is held. There is a portrait of a woman in white on the wall of the hall which attracts unusual attention, and when it is mooted that a legend attaches to it the count is sought out to explain it. The white lady, he said, was an ancestress who loved a youth from whom she was forcibly parted by her father, and on the day of her loveless wedding with a man whom her father had selected for her, she suddenly died, dressed in her bridal robes. "The legend goes," concludes the count, "that the white lady sometimes steps down from the picture to meet her lover." Lady Vera seeks out Erik to tell him that the legend of the white lady has given her an idea by which she hopes to further his suit with Eva. At her dictation Erik despatches a note to Eva asking her to come to his home the next morning in company with her father. Immediately afterwards Vera explains to a number of her male friends staying at the count's house and secures their consent to help in the conspiracy in which she is engaged. They proceed to indulge with the somewhat inebriated count and contrive to remain with him while all the rest of the hunting party depart. In the meantime Vera and Erik, by bribing one of the servants, secure the keys of the tower in which the heirlooms of the aristocratic house are treasured, and, after a short search, find the identical garments worn by the white lady when her portrait was painted. Vera dons these while Erik covers the portrait with black velvet, and two of the conspirators at the same time buckle on the mail armor which has been placed on either side of the portrait. Vera then takes position in the frame. The count is brought down from his bedroom when all is ready, and is installed on two chairs in front of the picture. At the stroke of twelve Erik and the two companions who have carried the sleeping count downstairs make a noise from an adjoining room, and cause the count to wake. Vera slowly descends and the count visibly quakes with fear. She leads him to an adjacent table and demands him to write his consent to the marriage of Erik and Eva. As soon as he has signed the paper and Vera has taken it, he makes a bolt for his room, and fancying that he is pursued by the ghost of the white lady he strikes out blindly as he goes along—Aunt Ulrica, who has entered the gallery to discover the cause of the noise which had awakened her, receiving a blow in the face which, in the morning, is revealed through a discolored eye. At breakfast Ulrica's appearance with this discolored eye causes such mirth that all the young people, one after another, have to leave the room, and when the count is left alone with his sister he is subjected to a curtain lecture which makes him shake like a jellyfish. In accordance with the letter received from Erik, Eva and her father call at the count's home in the course of the morning. Aunt Ulrica sweeps majestically by with her nose in the air, and the count plainly shows his disapproval of their visit. The fact that he has given his consent to their marriage in due legal form overnight is brought to his attention, and he wavers; then Vera pleads with him for the young lovers, and he relents, giving them his benediction. Vera then takes the count aside to explain the conspiracy over night, and the count, who has up till now been mystified by what he thought was a bad dream, but which he failed to reconcile with the fact that he had written his consent to Erik's marriage with Eva, fully enters into the spirit of the joke, evidently forgetful of the reckoning which Ulrica may be expected to exact.

PRINCESS ELENA'S PRISONER (Four parts).—The princess is presiding at a reception being given in the old castle during the absence of her venerable father. The prime minister announces that the old soldier has again overcome his warring neighbors. The princess does not appear to be over elated, because she recalls that a young captain, whom she had once met in times of peace, might be among the dead or the wounded. Sure enough he is brought to a hospital, a wounded prisoner, and Elena volunteers to act as his nurse despite the protests of the prime minister.

As he regains some of his normal strength he chafes under the restraint imposed upon him, and in her efforts to ease his lot, the princess issues orders that he may have use of the castle grounds. In his walks he frequently comes in contact with the princess, and while their intimacy ripens, the prime minister grows more jealous. At length he clearly indicates his aversion to her companionship with an avowed enemy of her country, and in the name of the king seeks to restrict the captain from exercising in the grounds of the castle.

The princess dismisses him and continues to secure an occasional tete-a-tete with the captain. He persistently pleads to her to help him escape from the confinement that is so galling to him and at length she accedes. She forwards to his apartments a rope ladder and a revolver hidden beneath a consignment of books. In the silence of the night he lowers his rope and makes his perilous descent to the foot of the walls. A sentry spies him, fires a warning shot, and engages the captain in a stern struggle. The captain manages, however, to break away; but soon he has a troop of cavalry on his track. He swims a river and rushes pell-mell through woodland country, but his mounted pursuers gradually gain upon him and, still weak from his wounds, he falls panting to the ground as they reach him. A court-martial quickly follows his recapture, and the dread verdict is summarily issued.

Princess Elena sends for the prime minister, who has already signed the death warrant, and pleads to him to revoke it. He says he is ready to do so, but imposes, as a condition, that she should become his (the prime minister's) wife. She returns abruptly to her apartments and determines on a course which seems to her to offer the only possible way out for her and the man she loves. Under the cover of the night and closely veiled she steals to the prison and then gains admission to the cell in which the condemned man is crouched in an attitude of hopelessness. At first he thinks she is but a vision of his disordered mind, but when he folds her in his arms he understands the depth of love which has prompted her to come to him. She tells him that the chances of escape are too forlorn to attempt, and knowing that she cannot save him, she has decreed there is only one thing to do—to die together. She takes a paper knife, from her dress and hands it to him, but he recoils, and in an outburst declares that he will not die, but must go back to his country. His country comes first, and recognizing the inevitable, and the futility of their love, the princess rushes from the cell and secures a uniform of a prison warder. The captain kisses her and makes his escape. Later she is found on the floor of the cell, a victim of her own stiletto.

THE TREASURE OF BUDDAH (Three parts).—An English regiment desecrates Goddess Kali by stealing from her supposedly sacred head, the wonderful crown of jewels. Vasantasena, the daughter of the Prince Gab-el-Mander, the custodian of the jewels, incited by an old priest into a frenzied, fanatical hatred, swears to avenge the insult to the goddess and to recover the treasure. With three of her followers she travels the seas and in England seeks means of entering the vaults of the British treasury, wherein are kept the spoils of war. Lieutenant Hamilton, one of the custodians, falls prey to her meretricious wiles. Out-tricked, disgraced, he is dismissed from his office when it is discovered that the treasure of Buddha has been stolen. Seeking to retrieve his superiors' favor, he embarks for India, accompanied by Bower, a Scotland Yard detective. They strike the trail of Vasantasena and her accomplices. The fugitives, hearing of the pursuit, change their route. Lost in the wilderness, the pursuers almost die from thirst. They encounter a Hindoo magician. With the aid of his mesmeric powers they are shown, while in a hypnotic state, the encampment of Vasantasena's party.

Lieutenant Hamilton is captured. Bowers escapes and goes for reinforcements, after having stolen from Vasantasena the much-sought crown. To deceive her he had substituted a spurious imitation. Hamilton is sentenced to die. Vasantasena, aroused by love's longings, offers to liberate him. He spurns her advances. Hamilton, in the midst of the enraged fanatics, is about to be sacrificed to the altar flames, to appease the wrath of the Goddess Kali, when, with a whoop and a hurrah, in rushes the English troops, led by Bower. They snatch Hamilton from the flames, whose red forks lick hungrily at him.

WARNER'S FEATURES.

THROUGH THE FIRES OF TEMPTATION (Three Parts.)—Helen, the daughter of a poor backwoods farmer, is fascinated by the heartless city chap who makes her humble home his headquarters while on a hunting trip. A short time after the sportsman's return to the city, his letters cease. Poor Helen, in disgrace, is driven from her home. In the city she finds work as a laundress, earning barely enough to live and care for her new-born babe. She meets a rich man, Humphrey, by name, who lends her money to buy new clothes. In an incredibly short time she finds herself completely in his power. Escaping from his apartments, she seeks death in the river, but is saved by the Salvation Army Captain, and consecrates her life to the cause. In her work of saving souls, Helen enters a cafe and there comes face to face with her own sister, now a dancer. Here follow several touching scenes, showing the redemption of the wayward sister and her happy marriage to a worthy fellow. Helen's final surrender to the Salvation Army Captain provides a fitting climax.

FAMOUS PLAYERS.

THE DAY OF DAYS (Four parts).—Cyril Scott, the eminent romantic actor, who won such sensational success in the stellar roles of "The Prince Chap," "The Lottery Man," and other dramatic triumphs, is ideally cast in "The Day of Days" as a young bookkeeper named Perceval, who has led an uneventful life until fate chooses him as the central figure in one of the strangest plots ever woven about the life of the metropolis. Perceval finds himself in the midst of a series of thrilling episodes that take him from the lowly earth to the high peaks of romance. Louis Joseph Vance based his exciting novel on Oriental fatalism, which assigns to every man his "day of days," wherein he shall range the skies and plumb the abyss of his destiny, alternately its lord and slave.

In the course of the story, Perceval becomes the hero of a chain of fantastic and fascinating adventures, aids an heiress to escape a villain, finds a card in the villain's hat that sends him to a notorious gambling house, where he breaks the bank, and where, later, an attempt to rob him is frustrated by a timely raid. He effects his escape from the gambling house in the clothes of one of the officers, finds himself in a woman's bedroom, explains his presence by telling her he is after a burglar, his uniform corroborating the story, breaks away and turns up again in a secret dive of the underworld, re-escapes in time to discover the villain's plot to abduct the heiress, confronts the villain in disguise at a fancy ball, rescues the heiress a second time, becomes involved in a fight with the villain's hired gunmen, forces his way into a garage, dashes through the garage doors with the heroine in his arms, makes his way to an automobile and liberty, and in the final chapter thwarts the villain's schemes by marrying the heiress, just as the clock denotes the end of his "Day of Days."

The story gets down to the heart of New York, and feels the pulse of the metropolis throughout.

MUNDSTUK FEATURES.

THE WHIRL OF DESTINY.—In obedience to her father's wishes, Louise marries Dr. Hortz, a chemist, although she really loves Richard Marx, a childhood friend of the doctor. The doctor is so interested in experimenting for a chemical formula that will transform all organic matter into cellulose, that he fails to give his wife proper attention. After two years he succeeds in finding the long sought formula, but his limited means prevent him from bringing his discovery before the world.

After years of travel, Richard Marx returns a wealthy man and meets his old friend, the doctor. He is interested in the discovery and furnishes the money for his enterprise. One night the doctor is alone in the factory when a fire breaks out. In his desperate efforts to save all that was possible, the doctor goes into Richard's office and gathers all available papers. Among these are the love letters which Louise had written to Richard before her marriage. The doctor reads them and is prostrated by the news, and feeling that he is in the way of his wife's happiness, he decides to leave the city and go West.

All believe him dead, and later the factory fails. His wife and their son, Frank, are left penniless, so Frank decides to go West in search of a fortune. One night, in a saloon out West, Frank gets into an argument with a cowboy and accidentally shoots him. The feeling against Frank is very strong and he is captured, and the cowboys plan to end his life. The sheriff is advised of their action while in the saloon, and while he is being told of the shooting, he discovers a tiny gold chain on the floor, which he recognizes. He immediately rushes to the spot where Frank is about to be killed and at once recognizes him as his own son and frees him. Dr. Hortz had become the sheriff of the county. They then leave for home, and Louise, who is so overcome by the sight of her husband whom she had believed dead, dies in his arms.

FEATURES IDEAL.

THE FUGITIVE (Three parts).—No obstacles can stand in the way of Rosalie's love for the artist Corrado. Despite her family's opposition, particularly that of her brother, Rosalie weds the man she loves. Their days are one long poem of love and happiness. They are further blessed by the birth of their daughter, Ada. Corrado works steadily. Alonzo, who resents the insulting intrusion of the stranger in their family, decides to snatch Rosalie and Ada from the hands of the hated brother-in-law, but Corrado, warned by the old man-servant, who had previously aided Rosalie in her flight, stays at home to await developments. Alonzo soon shows himself angered and insulting. The artist contains himself, but his violent nature cannot long endure that torrent of threats and abuse: the fight in the dark is as sudden as it is terrible. Suddenly, Corrado draws back terrified; he has killed his enemy. He runs away like a madman, his face congested and his hands stained with blood; he falls in the hands of gendarmes, who arrest him. Unable to defend himself, he is condemned to imprisonment for life.

Rosalie is reduced to the most abject misery, and unable to buy the remedies so necessary to her sick child, Dr. Palmieri, a good and generous man, comes to her assistance and requests her to share his home—Ada will grow in his house, and he will thus fancy that he has found again his daughter Emma. Palmieri shall be her father and Rosalie will give up her sacred name of mother, so that Ada may always ignore her father's unhappy fate.

Corrado wears out his years in prison, tired both in spirit and body. One day he has visions of his happy days, and his heart is rent asunder. He has now but one object in view—escape. He succeeds. Ragged and famished, he wanders through forest, plains, byways, ever sustained by the thought of his wife and daughter. Disguised in clothes kindly given to him by a peasant, he arrives in his native land. Deeply moved, he kneels at the threshold of the village church and prays—he, who has never prayed. He enters the presbytery, where he is greeted by the priest and one of his former friends. He learns with intense delight that his wife and daughter live in the village—Ada is in that house yonder—Corrado calls on the doctor.

Greatly troubled and frightened, Rosalie finds herself in the presence of her child's father. What is going to happen? Rosalie implores Corrado to keep silent, but the latter has seen his "beautiful little one" who believes herself to be the doctor's daughter. He has seen his Ada; he wants her.

The doctor, a human and loving being, endeavors to dissuade Corrado from his designs, points out to him that he is "civilly dead"—he has escaped from prison: he is being sought for—what about his daughter? Nothing can move Corrado, not even Rosalie's painful confession of the sacrifice she has made. Corrado must have his Ada. "Very well!" exclaims Palmieri, "your daughter shall learn and decide."

Frightened and trembling upon hearing that revelation, Ada seeks a refuge in the arms of the one she has always believed to be her father and whom she so tenderly loves. No—that man cannot be her father.

Everything is ended for Corrado. His heart, deprived of its life-giving element, scarcely beats; he understands that a supreme sacrifice is necessary iniluctable, and while Ada, who has drawn nigh, prays for him, he fondly kisses her hair and swallows a poisonous pellet.

The end is nigh—his life is ebbing away, he smiles. Uniting Rosalie's and the doctor's hands above the innocent girl's head, he murmurs, "Love one another; be happy and watch over her."

He dies in peace. His daughter has called him "Father!"—my "father!"

Film Quality

Quality in the film—quality from a technical photographic standpoint is as important to the Exhibitor as is interest in the story that the film tells.

There's one film that's recognized the world over as the standard of quality—that is always used by those whose effort it is to give the Exhibitors the very best goods and the very best service—Eastman film.

And it is identifiable. Look for "Eastman" on the perforated margin.

Radium Gold Fibre Screen

Below are listed just a few bona-fide extracts selected at random from different letters, sent in unsolicited by us, from users of our wonderful screen. They prove that:

Every User Is an Enthusiast

"Would not be without a RADIUM GOLD FIBRE SCREEN if I had to pay a thousand dollars for it."

"Curtain received and installed and must say it has improved my pictures 100%."

"My lighting bill for last month was $80.49. I have cut it in half this month."

"Our projection troubles are over since installing your screen. No clouds, streaks or dark spots on my new RADIUM GOLD FIBRE SCREEN."

Are you a live manager? Do you want to give your patrons a 100% better picture and at the same time reduce your light bills 50%? If you do you should install a RADIUM GOLD FIBRE SCREEN.

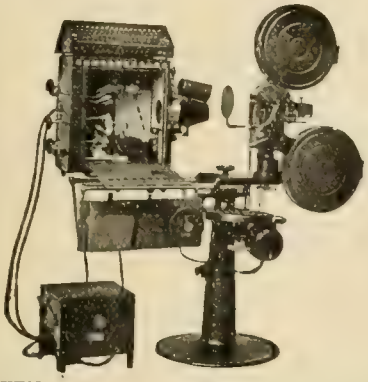
THE PROOF OF MOTIOGRAPH QUALITY



ONE OF MANY TESTIMONIALS THE MOTIOGRAPH RECEIVES DAILY

Mr. Edward H. Kemp, San Francisco, Cal.

Dear Sir:—A year ago this month you sold the Lecture Bureau of the Panama Pacific International Exposition, a complete 1912 Model Motiograph with special trunks. The outfit has been used constantly by the Manager, Dr. F. V. Fisher, during the past year, giving 6 to 10 lectures a trip, and traveling 100,000 miles through the United States. The machine is rendering just as efficient service today as a year ago.

We did NOT have to make a single adjustment on the Motiograph, no parts broke, in fact the equipment never failed. Thanks to the quality of your goods.

I trust that this letter will help to convince others, as I have been convinced, that your line of equipment for Lecturers, is the best and most complete to be had. Yours sincerely,

GEO. C. CROWE.

JUST PLAIN COMMON SENSE tells you—When you want to SEE yourself you use a Mirror. Because you SEE yourself better with a Mirror than any other means in the world. Now the same thing applies. When you want to SEE motion pictures, use a MIRROR SCREEN. Because you SEE the pictures so much plainer, better and clearer on a Mirror Screen than on any other surface under the sun. Besides it tickles your patrons and makes picture fans. It's a fact. The difference between a motion picture on a MIRROR SCREEN and any other screen of any other kind is the same comparison between seeing your own reflection in a fine French plate glass mirror and in a mud puddle. The "MIRROR SCREEN" is a Mirror. A magnificent mirror made from the finest polished plate glass that the world can produce. Get Right and Write to us to-day for our new Snow White Prismized Finished Surface. Sargent's Photoplay Service

To aid those who wish to guard against the formation of bad writing habits, or who wish to estimate their progress, I offer the following service:

Script Criticism For a fee of two dollars for each reel, I will read your manuscript and write a personal letter, pointing out the faults of plotting, technical development, manuscript preparation, etc. Sometimes I can help you to make the script salable, but I do not guarantee a sale. I do not revise manuscript; I do not typewrite it, nor do I offer it for sale. I simply write you a letter that tells you what the trouble is.

Plot Estimates If your stories do not sell and you want to know why, send me five synopses and one full script. I will criticise the script and tell you whether it is your plot or your development that is wrong. The fee for this service is $5 for the five synopses and additional plot. Synopses must not run more than 300 words each. Send a synopsis of your undeveloped plot and fee of one dollar and you will be advised as to whether it will pay you to develop the same.

Please Note My fees do not include envelopes or return postage. Send prepaid and self addressed return envelope and remit in New York exchange; not local checks. I reserve the right to return unread (with fee) any story or plot that does not warrant treatment. All scripts must be typewritten.

ANOTHER POWERS MACHINE INSTALLED IN THE PILOT

The Pilot Theatre, "Winston-Salem's Modern Movie", is installing today their second motion picture machine, a Powers Camegraph, No. 6 A. When this machine is installed the Pilot will have one of the most up-to-date and best equipped machine rooms to be found anywhere. This machine was built by the Nicholas Power Company, of New York City, whose sales represent sixty-five per cent. of the entire moving picture machine output of America.

The Powers 6 A. is the very latest model machine on the market today and in its mechanism is embraced many detailed exclusive features and advanced ideas that give it a rank of supremacy that has been maintained and recognized for sixteen years throughout the motion picture world.

Much notice has been attracted by the Pilot's machine room which is located in the alley at the rear of the building, the small holes for projection being the only direct opening that connects the house with the machine room, the rest being separated by a solid fire-proof wall.

The Goods

The market is crowded with pictures.

Every new issue of the trade papers tells you of new brands and new companies. It is hard to keep track of them, they come – and go – so fast.

Remembering them all is quite impossible.

Some of these new ones are good, some are fair, and most are very bad.

Your show can only live on good pictures. You can't afford to take a chance on poor stuff, no matter how much noise may be made about it for a few weeks.

You need the permanent business that comes to a picture house showing a reliable program of good pictures. A program made up of brands that are known to every picture fan. A program that has had worldwide advertising for years – a program with a reputation long established – a program that will be advertised in a most effective, helpful manner – a program with the goods back of the advertising: THE GENERAL FILM PROGRAM!

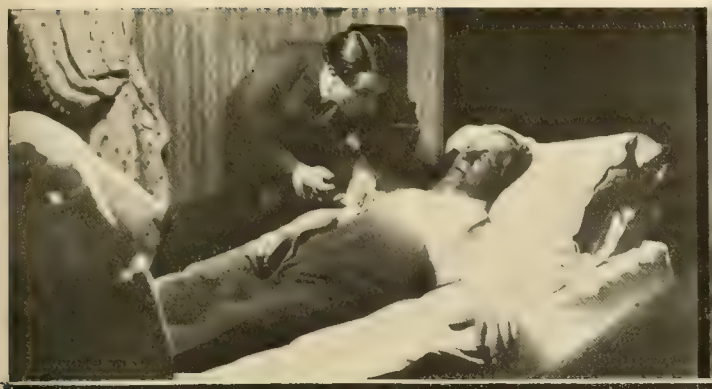
BETWEEN SAVAGE and TIGER

COMING SOON IN SIX PARTS



The treachery of a supposed friend brands Lord Villiers a political thief. His disappearance and return, apparently after death, make a sensational and highly interesting story.

KLEINE-CINES

(In Two Parts)

"AFTER DEATH"

(Copyright, 1914, by George Kleine)

For Release Tuesday, February 10th, 1914

Lord Villiers takes charge of some papers to prevent the arrest of a political ally. His friend, Dr. Lee, in love with Villier's wife, proposes to Villiers that he hide the incriminating papers. This Villiers does, and later is unable to locate them.

As a possible way out of the difficulty, Dr. Lee induces Villiers to take an injection of a serum which produces a semblance to death. Villiers is pronounced dead and his body deposited in the family tomb. Dr. Lee then enters upon the life of Villiers in the latter's home, Villiers having foolishly left one-half of his property to Lee. An old servant, who, from behind closed doors, had witnessed the administering of the serum, grows suspicious and brings about the resuscitation of Villiers.

The Lord then return to his home, hides in an unfrequented room, and by night makes excursions through the different apartments of the house. In this way he discovers the long lost papers and overhears Dr. Lee make love to his wife. At the psychological moment he dramatically enters the room and denounces Lee. The Doctor, believing Villiers to have died from his incarceration in the tomb, is driven insane.

THE CHRONICLES OF CLEEK

Featuring Ben Wilson

This great series of detective mysteries has already proven a big success. Thomas W. Hanshew, the well-known writer of detective stories, is the author of the series; it is produced in co-operation with Short Stories. Each of these films shows a separate mystery which Cleek solves. It is not necessary to show each film in succession. We are running these stories in serial form because experience shows that having one character as a central figure gives the film infinitely greater drawing power than having different characters playing the part of the detective. It brings your audience back to see the next film in the series.

Facts and Comments

A WELL-KNOWN Catholic writer, the Rev. John Talbot Smith, has joined in the clerical chorus of appreciation of motion pictures. In an article contributed to a semi-religious weekly paper he has this to say of the motion pictures: "The general attitude toward the motion picture should be sympathetic, watchful, kindly and firm, as the most astonishing invention of the human mind." The writer is a regular or at least frequent attendant of motion picture exhibitions, as appears from his intelligent review of a number of well-known features. Most of the clerical foes of the motion picture announce with pride that they never go to see a picture, thus gloriously advertising the fact that they do not know what they are writing and talking about.

In sad contrast with this enlightened clergyman is the attitude of a minister in El Paso, who frankly classes motion picture men among the most undesirable elements of the community. He says that he believes "in going into the field where God's name is not known. . . . The racehorse man, the moving picture show patron and the drunkard are welcome at my church, and I would like to see it filled with that kind of men." This is hitting not only the "fans" but the film centers generally. We are so bad that even the name of God is not known to us. We can just imagine the rush of all the lovers of films to the church of this reverend gentleman, who no doubt will soon take up a collection for the "conversion of racehorse men, motion picture patrons and drunkards." How this sanctimonious person must thank the Lord "that he is not like other men."

THE Grand Jury of this county has found indictments against three men connected with the production and exhibition of a so-called "white-slave" film. The inquisitorial body wanted to know why the owner of another theater where the objectionable exhibition had taken place was not arrested, and this phase of the situation will be carefully investigated. It was a significant fact that the grand jurors declined to hear more than one of the social reformers who had expressed the opinion that even the worst of films was to be tolerated if it "pointed a lesson." In the meantime the whole brood of white slave film promoters are laying low, which from their viewpoint is the best and safest position they can take. At this writing it does not seem likely that any more "white-slave" films will be obtruded upon the community. The Grand Jury did the sensible thing in dismissing the complaints against the operators and ticket-takers connected with the exhibition.

MANY ladies and gentlemen with plenty of leisure on their hands and with a supposedly inspired mission to reform mankind and generally to improve the handiwork of the Creator are beginning to look upon censorship as the finest indoor sport for both winter and summer. "Slumming" is falling into disuse, and instead of "slumming" parties, censorship expeditions are becoming all the rage. "Let's go and censor the moving pictures," someone will say, "and kill off this dreadful ennui." Out in Kansas, the home of Carrie Nation, the new indoor sport has attained great popularity among the ladies. In Wichita the city government has been petitioned to appoint "certain ladies to help the official censor." It is gratifying to note that one of the prominent ministers in the city has made a public protest against the further spread of this censoring mania. He speaks a kind word for the moving picture men, saying: "Our moving picture people are trying to give us things worth while and things morally elevating." The ultimate credit for this tribute is due to the exhibitors of Wichita, who realize their responsibilities and who by giving clean entertainments have disarmed all legitimate criticism.

THE editor of a great Western paper, rebuking one of his readers who compared the moving pictures of today to "the dime novels of our early days," speaks of motion pictures as "great purveyors of genuine clean entertainment." The editor goes on to say that "the standard of the moving pictures is raised every year," and then, at some length, shows the educational advantages of the picture which are just begining to be realized. It would be easy to fill the pages of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD with similar tributes. The light is spreading fast. As the enemy disappears the friend takes his place. As matters stand today we have nothing to fear from honest criticism and very little from prejudice, but a good deal from men who have stolen into the fold by night and are trying to degrade the picture by making it serve the curiosity of the degenerate.

Weekly "Masterpieces"

By W. Stephen Bush

THE overproduction of "masterpieces" threatens to overwhelm the market. In the famous Uffizi gallery of Florence are perhaps two thousand great paintings, excluding mere portraits. These paintings are generally considered masterpieces. It has taken scores upon scores of artists and something like six centuries to produce these masterpieces. How much superior to these old-fashioned men are our modern producers of features! Their masterpieces come at the rate of one a week, and it must sorely puzzle our descendants in the third and fourth generation to find the space for preserving all these masterpieces.

A masterpiece used to be a strong expression full of meaning. It came down to us from the Middle Ages, when the skilled mechanic was obliged to give conclusive evidence of his ability by producing a work which would admit him into the ranks of the masters as distinguished from mere journeymen and apprentices. A committee of masters would sit in judgment on the offering of the journeymen who wanted to graduate into the masters guild, and if his offering was not worthy of a master he would have to try his skill again and again. No such slow and tiresome rules impede the production of our weekly masterpieces in the feature field. The process is ever so much simpler. Everybody is a master who calls himself a master. By a simple evolution in logic whatever the master produces is a "masterpiece."

There is really but one trifling obstacle to the indefinite production of these latter-day "masterpieces." The obstacle is the public. If the public can be induced to agree with the producers of "masterpieces" to the extent of paying the price of admission, all is well. Alas, for the sad experience of the past! The public has shown itself more and more discriminating, and it will not always agree with the producer in the estimate of his own production. The battlefield is strewn with the corpses of "masterpieces." "Masterpieces" of the weekly variety are constantly being rejected by the public. Depend on it, fellow-friends of the motion picture and all you exhibitors, that the public will grow more exacting day by day and week by week. If you, who wish to get prosperous by amusing the public via the motion picture, cannot choose the right kind of masterpieces, you will eventually have to retire from the field. The day when your program is dropped to you from your exchange as the manna dropped down from heaven for the benefit of the hungry Israelites is rapidly passing away. You must do your own thinking and nobody else will do it for you. The building of a program is a branch of architecture which cannot be learned in a day and which cannot be delegated to others. You will labor in vain if you do not make variety the keystone. Above all things will it be necessary for you to study the science of elimination. Of all the "masterpieces" that are offered, you will not want to take more than a very small percentage. You must, like a great editor, become an expert in the art of rejection.

The men who make masterpieces by the week are far above the reach of the poor critic, for whom they have nothing but the most profound contempt. Cervantes says somewhere that human nature will accept praise with pleasure even from a lunatic, while blame, though offered by the most intimate friend and with the finest of motives, will always be resented. Producers of weekly "masterpieces" can swallow mountains of the cheap praise which roots no deeper than the lips, but are seized with retching whenever the slightest fault is pointed out. By persevering in this unhappy frame of mind they are enabled to keep on producing a "masterpiece" every week until the bank roll begins to exhibit the dreadful symptoms of hasty consumption.

As a matter of fact, no sane person expects masterpieces to be released on a rigid weekly schedule. The decline in the popularity of the single reel is in very large measure due to this time-bound system of releases. The motion picture is too much of an art to be treated as merchandise pure and simple. The result of the rigid system of releasing and a certain quantity on a time limit produced monotony and made the pictures as much alike as one egg resembles another. Time and again it was pointed out in these columns that there were only about a dozen types or molds in the whole range of dramatic kinematography. The public was ready and eager for some new development along the lines of progress. Thus when the multiple reel came it was acclaimed with joy by the public, though very often, as we all know, the multiplicity of reels was made to cover a multitude of sins.

It is clear that there must come a reaction the moment the feature gets into the same rut along which the single reel found its way toward oblivion. If features are released like sausages from a machine they will fail to maintain their popularity. Features, of course, afford a greater chance for variety.

Eventually the whole market may adjust itself on this basis: The producers of high class features, on which more than ordinary care and skill is bestowed, will stand in the front rank. All other productions, whether in single or multiple reels, will take rank strictly in accordance with their quality. The ultimate judge will be the public, and the most reliable interpreter of the public taste and demand will be the exhibitor. The ability of the exhibitor will play no small part in the gradual clearing of the film situation. Three and four years ago he was but a pitiable cipher when it came to using initiative and exercising his judgment. Today he has every opportunity to rise by the exercise of his own ability and the assertion of his individuality. Ultimately the responsibility of the exhibitor will be greater than that of the producer. In other countries it is the exhibitor who dominates the situation because he is free to choose and he chooses as his public wants him to choose. We look, therefore, to the exhibitor of the future to shape or at least help to shape the policy of the producer. He will be the last judge of quality.

To the exhibitor will belong the task of dealing with the weekly "masterpieces" that are pouring down upon him in these days. If he decides that many or perhaps most of these "masterpieces" are sadly overpraised affairs and not desired by his public, the production of this kind of kinematographic absurdities will soon be on the wane. Not only will the first-class houses refuse to exhibit them, but it will be difficult to get them rented in any motion picture theater which is anywhere near the outskirts of civilization. Exchanges and state-right buyers will keep away from weekly "masterpieces," and the production thereof will, as the lawyers say, "cease and determine": a consummation devoutly to be wished by all who care for the good name and the quality standards of the motion picture art.

The Art of Criticism

By Louis Reeves Harrison

What is the first and most important requisite of a photodrama to be classed as a masterpiece?

A. That it shall contain a vital meaning.

That being a general answer, what specific use is made of the words "vital meaning"?

A. Soul must speak to soul on a subject of deep interest to those receiving the message.

Are there subjects of universal interest?

A. Many.

What, for instance?

A. The purpose of existence; the significance of what we are doing; our own artificial creations, such as religion, law and society, for human betterment, and what pertains to their betterment; the efficiency and reward of effort; harmonizing achievement with improvement; in what sense ideas rule the world——

The highest and brightest ideas?

A. Only when they can be so presented as to permeate the great mass and shape the thought of society in general. Many that have not ruled the world through literature and the drama may become universally effective through screen portrayal.

How about war as a subject?

A. Its pictured horrors should argue for peace.

Do they not excite the military spirit?

A. The spirit of struggle for supremacy is as old as the human race; it furnishes abundant material for the drama; its visualization, if truthful, must draw attention to war's misery and woe, and to its appalling waste of vital energy.

How should tragedy operate?

A. As a tonic.

And intense drama?

A. To quicken sympathy.

How about high comedy?

A. To entertain and encourage.

And farce?

A. To brighten dull moments.

Should each have a message?

A. To be a masterpiece.

Is a message essential in photodrama?

A. Not even life. But there must be power or beauty in the inanimate portrayal. One or the other of these is often satisfying to the eye in what both nature and art have to offer, even though it be soulless, but, unless they are pregnant with suggestion, their chief importance lies in their relation to a theme. This enters upon the domain of "treatment."

Granting the importance of a vital meaning, what is a prime requisite of treatment?

A. Critical instinct.

Above imagination?

A. It may go astray. Imagination is common to nearly all, whereas the critical instinct of a true artist is so rare that it alone advances creative work beyond mediocrity. Imagination may be illusion—criticism is the natural child of cultivation and thought. All artistic treatment of a subject implies the critical faculty.

It molds the form?

A. When unaided by creative imagination, hence so many lifeless photodramas of artistic form, all body and no soul. The finest treatment requires a faculty critically creative or creatively critical, such as is possessed by genius. The sum of intellect plus character in a man is untrammeled in its expression, because its standard is itself.

Then genius is rare?

A. It is abundant enough, but it needs careful nourishment to attain full growth. It thrives on opportunity well removed from drudgery.

What does masterly treatment involve?

A. In a general way, preparation that clarifies while exciting curiosity, exposition that is tense yet delicately suggestive of the end in view, characterization that quickens interest in the outcome, an unobtrusive undercurrent of logic that does not drift into unimportant or inconsistent details, and a conclusion satisfying to common intelligence and sympathy, all contributing to make effective the author's aim.

Do most photodramas hit where they aim?

A. Most photodramas are arrows shot in the air. In the absence of sharp competition, producers have been satisfied to make a chance hit now and then, especially with visualizations of what has been done in other arts.

To what may their failure be ascribed?

A. Lack of good critics, for actors and directors must have the critical faculty to exhibit a work of art in a form different from that of its first presentation. They try to reproduce exactly, not grasping the essential principle that the art of screen portrayal is not merely imitative, and one result is usually a loss of what animated the original. An author who has a story to tell selects among several possible arrangements such construction as seems best suited to his purpose, though he may never be entirely satisfied with what he has done. There is, therefore, nothing particularly sacred about the way he presents his subject matter. If he possessed creative and critical instinct in high degree, he would be first to appreciate the necessity of tremendous changes to meet the requirements of a different art. In the matter of adaptation, it is better to approximate an author's meaning rather than his method.

Will original stories supersede adaptations?

A. That is reasonable to expect in due time. There are men and women of character plus intellect who have weathered storms of passion, who grasp the meaning of the present from the past, who perceive the farcical side of our antiquated codes, who could advance ideas of our future social state or charmingly mirror this or that phase of life's infinite variety, who might struggle in vain with technics of literature and the stage, yet be able to give their thoughts vivid expression on the screen. Some producers seeking popularity and profit by superior work are already encouraging talent wherever they find it.

What is the future of criticism?

A. Undetermined. A good critic must be able to collect evidence of power successfully exercised and use it to guide this new art out of a labyrinth of mediocrity. Such men will be hard to find as long as production is more sincerely commercial than artistic. Improvement is bound to come in the course of keen competition, but there is a present need of clearer vision. Men are blind on one side who do not see that this art of thought communication, the only one besides printing discovered in two thousand years, must have something worth while to communicate.

The Camera on the Firing Line

Indisputable Proof of General Sherman's Definition of War.

By W. Stephen Bush.

IF YOU want to realize the difference between so-called realistic war pictures and just real war pictures look at the work that was done with the camera right on the firing line in the months of July and August of last year, when the Greeks and the Bulgarians were fighting a battle to the death in and about the Struma valley. These pictures were taken by Robert Schwobthaler, a pioneer in the film business. The King of Greece, fully alive to the educational value of the motion picture, called Mr. Schwobthaler from Paris and asked him to be the photographic historian of this war. Maybe it was a little war as wars go in these days, but it was bitterly real and earnest. No finer argument could be imagined for the promotion of peace than these same pictures. I would advise Mr. Schwobthaler to use our famous general's famous definition of war right up close to the main title.

Robert Schwobthaler.

Mr. Schwobthaler had an assistant and between the two men some very valuable pictures were taken. You see batteries in action, infantry advancing and cavalry charging, not in mimicry, but in the bloody and brutal reality of war. At one time the two men posted their cameras almost in the center of a big battlefield and they caught shrapnel exploding, companies deploying and attacking, wounded men reeling backward and falling down the hill and cavalry coming to the rescue with drawn sabres and going at top speed. The cameras caught all the work or at least a good deal of the work of murder and destruction that followed the retreat of the Bulgarians like a lurid column of fire in one of the circles of the great Tuscan's Inferno. You see one prosperous little town turned into a bloody shambles. You see fifteen Greek hostages held by the Bulgarians lying dead on the ground, they having been shot because they were unable to furnish the ransom demanded by the Bulgarians. Mr. Schwobthaler arrived just a few minutes after the poor victims had been murdered. There is little of the romance and the glory which poets associate with war visible in these films which tell the truth so plainly and so literally.

Not the least interesting part of these films is the part devoted to showing the work of the Red Cross Society on and about the battlefield.

"I have been asked," said Mr. Schwobthaler, "to lend my pictures dealing with the work of the Red Cross Society to the men and women interested in the work of the Peace Society. I would, of course, gladly do so if the pictures were still mine, but I have sold the American rights to a Greek-American syndicate. No one can testify more eloquently than I can to the brutalizing influence of war. I used to turn my eyes away from anything that looked like an accident or a fight, but after witnessing the daily horrors in the Struma valley I grew callous in spite of myself, and at last could look upon human suffering and misery without that thrill of pity that throbs in the breasts of all normal human beings. The methods of warfare adopted by the Bulgarians were barbarous in the extreme, indeed, the Bulgarians are little more than savages while the Greeks showed great humanity, feeding Bulgarian prisoners and fugitives at a time when they themselves were hard pressed for food. Water was always a most precious commodity, as in most of the rivers and ponds human bodies were decaying in the summer heat. Even their water the Greeks freely shared with their captive foes. I have proved conclusively that the Bulgarians were in the habit of using the dum-dum bullets, which are forbidden by the rules of civilized warfare. I have made pictures of soldiers who had been wounded with these deadly bullets. The dum-dum bullet explodes in the body, breaks the bone and sets up gangrene. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the dum-dum bullet causes death. My pictures show how terrible the wounds are and what frightful suffering they cause to the victims. One of my pictures shows the most popular nurse in the army busily at work. This girl is Irish by birth and the soldiers just adore her. The endurance and bravery of the Greek soldiers are incredible. I saw them submit to the most painful operations and amputations and never utter a sound. I can show by my pictures that the Bulgarians violated another rule of civilized warfare by firing upon a flag of truce. I showed the pictures before the Emperor of Germany, who asked me whether I was under cover when I worked my camera. He was very much surprised to hear me say no."

Mr. Schwobthaler will stay in this country for several weeks and is located in the Belmont Hotel in this City.

"Fooling Uncle" (Beauty.)

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

"FOOLING UNCLE" is the second subject that will be released by the American under the brand of "Beauty Film." It will be released January 21.

From all who delight in clean, snappy comedy, of the society comedy-drama type, there will be a warm welcome for Miss Margarita Fischer, Harry Pollard and Fred Gamble in "Fooling Uncle."

It was really a delightful task to view this film. Miss Fischer is a vivacious, charming comedienne, who never resorts to slapstick to gain her ends. True, sometimes, the action treads closely on the threshold of farce, but it never gets quite there. There is always the refinement of method that escapes the vulgar in carrying a point. We laugh and enjoy it because the intelligence of the method appeals to our own intelligence and not to the risibilities that are excited by something in the nature of a practical joke. Instead of using the proverbial slapstick, Miss Fischer and Messrs. Pollard and Gamble carry fairy wands and slap our imagination in such delicate, merry fashion that we are forced to laugh in Aeolian harp fashion and not like the crash of an organ.

Scene from "Fooling Uncle" (Beauty).

For myself I hope that these "Beauty Films" will have a wide appeal. There may be picture theater goers who like their fun administered in more strenuous fashion; but I believe there are a great many more who will acclaim the "Beauty Film" type. The photography is most praiseworthy, and the title, subtitles and the close are conceived with nice artistry.

RUDOLPH WURLITZER DEAD.

Rudolph Wurlitzer, founder of the Rudolph Wurlitzer Company, manufacturers of musical instruments, among which is the Hope-Jones Unit Orchestra, much in favor among motion picture exhibitors, died at his home in Auburndale, a suburb of Cincinnati, Ohio, on Wednesday, January 14. The deceased was born on February 1, 1831, at Schoeneck, Saxony. His ancestors for generations had been builders of musical instruments, and one of his forbears was Hans Adam Wurlitzer, the violin maker celebrated throughout the fatherland, who was born in 1732, almost a hundred years before Rudolph Wurlitzer. Mr. Wurlitzer completed his education at the Technical University, at Leipsic, and came to the United States. Two years later he went into the musical instrument industry, and in 1856 he established his own business as an importer of musical instruments.

"Lincoln the Lover"

A Vitagraph Poetic Drama.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

DISCARDING mere technical or traditional devices or conventions, this photodrama rises to vision and kindles the imagination like poetry, yet it is also educational, a contribution to the biography of a great man of modern times. The impersonation of Abraham Lincoln by Ralph Ince is so intelligent and so sympathetic that we are actually glimpsing a phase of the martyred president's private life and one which may have had an important bearing on his interesting career.

Goethe says, "The principal design of biography is to present the man in relation to his epoch; and to show to what extent the whole environment was favorable or unfavorable to him; how he shaped out of it for himself a conception of the world and of man; and how he found expression for his concept. To attain this, however, demands what is hardly within human reach, the individual's knowledge of himself and of his times, those influences which determine and shape the individual so that it might well be said that had a man been born either ten years earlier or ten years later he might have been as an individual and as a world factor something very different."

This glimpse of "Lincoln the Lover" presents the romance of his early life, but it does so with no loss of dignity and a material gain in beauty, and there is absent the element of misrepresentation which causes so many biographies to be disappointing. It resuscitates with nice fidelity the vanishing and almost forgotten state of society in which Lincoln lived. It has another high merit, that of enlisting sympathy for a man whose private life has been overshadowed by his remarkable public career.

For purposes of contrast, the play opens with a view of the President at a high point in his popularity. He wearies of popular acclamation, so meaningless compared with the pure love of one true heart, and sits down before his grate fire to muse and dream. The trend of his thoughts is quietly visualized. We go back with him to the days when he courted Ann Rutledge and watch the great awkward lover halt between his simple dignity, his unaffected self knowledge of power, and his timidity, his tendency to idealize, that which makes the bravest man weak in the presence of his supreme illusion.

He is compelled to suffer defeat for the first time at the hands of a man better endowed with physical graces and charms. Ann turns from him to John NcNeil as the realization of her ideal. Lincoln bows to the conquerer with noble humility, even congratulates the more fortunate man on winning the heart of so sweet a creature. When McNeil leaves for the East to attend to an inheritance, Lincoln is acting as postmaster, and he delivers to Ann a letter from her lover which, by a turn of fate, chances to be one breaking the engagement.

Lincoln tries again and at last wins the heart of Ann by his loyal devotion. She has barely consented to be his wife when there is another intervention, that of illness and death, and so the course of his life was diverted from what might have proved to be the demoralization of genius, the warm hearthstone. He pictures the bitterness of that dark hour, his visits to her grave, then is forced to contrast that simple sorrow with his present exalted state, and he realizes that he is but an instrument—it was not to be.

MUTUAL GIRL ENTERTAINS BROADWAY.

IT IS too early yet to say whether the average New York audiences are going to take special pleasure in following "Our Mutual Girl" through all her adventures; but in this beginning it is certain that she won favor with a good sized house at the Broadway, on Monday afternoon. She won it by the girlish simplicity of her acting which made it easy to sympathize with her. But as an offering of entertainment, this introduction number will please audiences out of town much more than here. While she was still a country girl and on her way to the great city, her adolescent love story, her country beau, her adventures on the way and her feelings held the audience under a spell in amusement or human sympathy; but there was a distinctly different atmosphere in the house when the picture began to be concerned with Madame Lucile's pretty models and the latest fashions in gowns. This part of the picture also had its following; but it was not as at the start, the whole audience. The interest did not need, necessarily, to have slackened and would not have if the story had cultivated the high intention of being artistic and human. So far the audience liked what has been provided and it is truly good; but it is clear that it has not started off on that level that would have made it wholly adequate.

The story is a bit conventional; it is not quite authoritative. This coming of a young girl to the great city to live is a very special and truly great adventure, and among those gowns the specialness of the adventure is lost. They make one suspect that such gowns as New York can furnish are the real object of this first part of the picture and not the girl's adventures, and, if it is so, and the other pictures are like it, the interest in them, though keen, may not be a match for the bigness of the idea involved in making fifty two pictures to give people a taste of the metropolis. We know nothing of what the other installments are going to be, and surely will not prejudge them. But it is a fact that the audience, for the first half, showed the keenest interest, while at the end there was but little applause.

"The Hermit" (American).

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

A SATISFYING, absorbing story has been filmed in two reels by the American, which is scheduled for release February 2, under the title "The Hermit." Thomas Ricketts directed the production, and he has been ably aided by a well selected cast. In contrast with the self-enforced seclusion of the leading character, we are treated in the opening pictures to views showing us the gay whirl of the pawns in society circles and to the strenuous life in the world of business, artistic touches which combine to increase our interest in the titular subject.

Scene from "The Hermit" (American).

The treatment of the story is reminiscent, and Mr. Ricketts has handled it with his accustomed skill. The tiny cottage of the recluse, half hidden by the vines and rich foliage of California, is ideal. His faithful companions, two dogs, serve to keep him in touch with the world that has treated him harshly and to remind him that life, however bitter, has its compensations in some form. The picturesque nook by the sea, where he sits perched on a rock, the solitude broken only by the crash of the waves, has been very happily chosen. Throughout the entire films the settings are appropriate, and the photography is of a quality that delights the eye.

Ed Coxen is the hermit. He has added to his reputation in this role. Watching him closely you will see that he has sunk his youthful personality in that of the middle aged man, who is still active but stiff in his movements. Demeanor, manner and make-up are all in fine keeping with the character.

Miss Winnifred Greenwood is required to appear as the gladsome young maiden with lovers at her beck and call, and as the mother of a young girl about the age that she herself is supposed to be when the story opens. In both characters she is equally at home, which speaks for her versatility. Miss Charlotte Burton is quite pleasing in the part of winsome Grace King, and George Field and William Bertram deserve mention in the parts of Tom King and Mr. Bliss.

John King, a wealthy young man, loves Lillian Bliss and is accepted by her. Tom King, his brother, also loves Lillian, and stoops to dishonor in order to gain her hand. He hires a burly ruffian to kidnap Lillian, and the plan failing he contrives to place the crime on his brother, John, who is sentenced to a term in prison. In the meantime Tom marries Lillian.

John learns of his brother's marriage while in prison, and, on his release, goes to California and becomes a hermit. His brother and Lillian believe him dead. His lawyer, whom he had bound to secrecy, furnishes him with money for his simple needs.

One day, Tom King learns from the lawyer that John is alive. Failing in health and expecting death soon, he writes a letter to John begging forgiveness and requesting that the knowledge of his crime be kept from Lillian. The lawyer forwards the letter to John.

After Tom's death Lillian and her daughter, Grace, visit California. There Grace and her young companions discover the hermit, on one of their auto trips. Grace is strangely affected by the reserved man and has quite an influence over him. She requests him to tell the story of his life as the party are eating luncheon under the trees in front of the hermit's cottage. As he finishes she asks to see the photograph of his sweetheart and immediately recognizes it as that of her mother, years ago.

Through the clever diplomacy of Grace and a good priest, the hermit and Lillian are brought face to face, a letter from the priest having revealed to her that John King was innocent of the crime charged to him. The final scene fades out as we are impressed that the former lovers will soon be united.

FRANCIS CARLYLE.

MR. FRANCIS CARLYLE, the well known leading man of the regular dramatic stage, is a recent addition to the stock company of Pathe Freres. Mr. Carlyle began his career under the management of Daniel Frohman at the old Lyceum Theater, appearing in "The Wife," "Sweet Lavender," "The Charity Ball," and many other successes of that noted place.

He has been under the direction of Charles Frohman, however, most of his time on the stage, playing Kerchival West in "Shenandoah" during its first season, and continuing in that part for three years. He was the original Major Mostyn in "The Sporting Duchess," also of the leading part in "The White Heather," in "Hearts are Trumps," "Because She Loved Him So," "Colorado," "The Flag Lieutenant," and played "Bertie Cecil" in "Under Two Flags," with Blanche Bates when it was first produced by Belasco at the Garden Theater. He was leading man at Palmer's Theater and at Daly's, playing there everything from Shakespeare to modern farce. Also with William Gillette in London, as well as in New York, with Nat Goodwin, Otis Skinner, Grace George and Mary Mannering. He played Captain Absolute in "The Rivals," and John Perrybingle in "The Cricket on the Hearth," with the late Joseph Jefferson. His experience has run the gamut; his metier, however, is emotional parts, and his ability to convey by subtle gesture and facial expression the intense, deeper and stronger feelings which sway all humanity at times, makes for him an especial place in moving picture art. Among the pictures he has appeared in since his association with Pathe Freres are: "Her Hour," "A Clever Story," "The Blight," "The Shadow of Shame," "Her Story," "The Son of the House," "For the Sake of his Son," "Kenton's Heir" and "The Refugee."

"An American King."

Two-Reel Edison Romance.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

THE Prince of Balkia, heir apparent to the throne, renounces his royal rights to marry the woman he loves and goes to America, where he settles as a man of affairs under the name "John North." Sixty years later, his American grandson, John North, now an orphan, follows Helen Bond, a banker's daughter, when her parents conduct her on a European tour. John and Helen love each other, but her ambitious parents—they are title-mad—coldly discourage North's attentions. Meanwhile, the royal line becomes extinct, but for young John North, and the prime minister plans to place him upon the throne if he is willing to assume its honors and responsibilities.

The banker and his family—there is a monacled Duke in attendance—make their devious way to Balkia, because pa-pah has it in mind to float bonds for the impoverished kingdom. John North, his valet, and Arthur, a Fidus Achates, tag along and arrive at an opportune moment. The prime minister has kept track of North's movements, contrives to meet the grandson of the man who renounced all rights to the succession and persuades him to accept the crown. North's motives are made plain—he hopes in ascending the throne to overcome the objections of Helen's parents. He takes a short cut by the side stairs in the ceremonial and betrays unfamiliarity with court forms in many amusing ways, but the air dictatorial is one all to easy to assume, and he becomes autocratic in matters of state, completely upsetting some of the prime minister's well cherished schemes. When it is made known that he is to wed a certain young and attractive lady of the court, he decrees that her hand shall be given in marriage to his chum, Arthur, who has fallen in love with her and found his sentiment reciprocated.

The American King loves Helen; she loves him; her parents are title-mad; so there is a delightful absence of suspense about the outcome. It is obvious, as in most such plays, that these two will embrace at the end, and the one slight difficulty in the way is overcome without a struggle on North's part. Suddenly, without previous intimation, during the final scenes, a new element is introduced that should have been shown or suggested at an earlier period in the development.

There are revolutionists, and one of these, Heska, has undertaken to poison the new king. He pours out a glass of wine near a picture panel, and she drops poison in his glass while he conveniently looks the other way. He turns in time to catch her by the wrist. Now, at last, there is opportunity for him to accomplish something worth while. The only pity is that the revolutionists were not put in evidence to awaken suspense during the preparation. It is too late to rouse interest in Heska and her cause and there is not enough room to show the new king in the act of using his high office to right the wrongs of an oppressed people. These sufferings are barely indicated at a time when the main action is drawing to an end, whereas an entire reel could have more consistently been given to enlisting sympathy ultimately destined to rouse enthusiasm over the American king's humanitarian acts. The time will probably come when an author can tell his story without considering reel limitations, in logical form, and it would have benefitted this photodrama to have amplified rather than to have pruned it down. It could have been made to fill three or four interesting reels.

FEATURE EXCHANGES TO INCORPORATE.

The feature film exchanges, of New York City, realizing the necessity of co-operation to discuss and pass upon the problems arising under their rapidly growing branch of the industry, and profiting by the success of co-operative methods, heretofore used in the motion picture industry, are organizing a membership corporation bearing the title Feature Film Renters Ass'n. Inc. A number of meetings have been held and the preliminary details disposed of. Messrs. Graham & Stevenson, of 15 Broad Street, have been retained to incorporate and organize the association.

The association will be in the nature of a Board of Trade and it is hoped by its founders that representation will ultimately be founded in this membership from every city where a feature film exchange is located in the United States. The incorporators will be as follows: World Special Films Corporation, Unique Feature Film Co., Weinberg Feature Film Co., Richter Feature Film Co., Easter Feature Film Co., Federal Feature Film Co., Manhattan Feature Film Co., Weisfield Feature Film Co., Emby Feature Film Co., Sedeg Feature Film Co., Supreme Feature Film Co., Standard Feature Film Co., All Star Film Printing Co., Sherrys Film Exchange, Theater Feature Film Co., Eagle Feature Film Co., Royal Feature Film Co., Special Feature Film Co., Feature Film Co., Regal Feature Film Co., Kineto Feature Film Co., Vita Feature Film Co., Ideal Feature Film Co., North American Film Co., Inc., De Luxe, Feature Film Co., High Grade Feature Film Co., The Film Exchange.

PICTURE MEN HAVE DINNER.

Northeastern Pennsylvania Exhibitors' Association Condemns "Underworld" Pictures at Meeting in Wilkesbarre.

The Northeastern Pennsylvania Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association met at the Hotel Redington, Wilkesbarre, Pa., on Wednesday, January 14, and enjoyed a fine dinner set for the occasion. Gilbert Miller of Plymouth, president of the association; Harvey Eggleston, J. Clayton Heebner, John Lynch, W. S. Wilson and others made excellent talks in which they suggested that the best results are obtained from showing good, clean pictures and that it was advisable not to handle vice or underworld pictures.

Those present were: Gilbert Miller, Plymouth; John Favinni, Jessup; Charles Schwartz, Nanticoke; L. A. Farrell and Louis Matule, Carbondale; J. D. Williams, W. S. Wilson, Francis Devlin, Harvey Eggleston, J. Clayton Heebner, Frederick W. Hermann, Wilkes-Barre, managers; Chief of Police John Roberts, E. L. Lindemuth, Daniel L. Hart, James Curry, Harry L. "For Ireland's Sake."

Gauntier Players Release a Good Three-Part Drama Produced in the Land of Erin.

By George Blaisdell.

ON their Irish productions the Gauntier Players have built a solid reputation. So far they have had the field all to themselves; no one else has cared to invade the island of song and story, or romance and also of suffering, for the purpose of showing in dramatized form on the screen the life of its people. Mr. Olcott, Miss Gauntier and Mr. Clark have made so many journeys to this island the stories of which have been so generously dramatized for the regular stage that they seem to have breathed-in the Irish atmosphere. "For Ireland's Sake," which was released through Warner's Features on January 12, is written and directed by Sidney Olcott. It is an interesting story, and the best part of it is the skillful, craftsmanlike way in which it is constructed and presented. The three parts seem short, a good proof of their entertaining qualities. The picture was made in County Kerry, and we see the famed Lakes of Killarney, the Gap of Dunloe, and other beauty spots in that vicinity. The setting forth of these facts in an explanatory sub-title at the beginning of the picture will add to its interest.

Marty, a peasant, is detected by British soldiers making a "few croppy pikes for the byes" and for this is hunted and, in spite of the aid given by his sweetheart, Eileen, is finally arrested and condemned to be hanged. Eileen, also, is sentenced to share his fate. Father Flannigan secretly conveys to Marty a big file, with which he breaks jail and then frees Eileen. The priest, waiting at the water's edge, marries the two and they take passage for America on a schooner.

The first scene is one that captures the interest. The two lovers ride down a winding lane in an orthodox donkey cart, past a dwelling unlike those we see in other pictures. Marty gayly and slyly kisses Eileen good-bye and goes to his forge on a rocky hillside. In the faint glow of the fire we see him hammering away—an effective bit. His escape from the soldiers is dramatic. Eileen, a great cloak over her shoulders, is rounding a hill, a lake in the near distance. She sees her lover fleeing from the soldiers. She throws the folds of the ample garment about Marty. The later hiding of the prisoner in the chimney of the inn furnishes an element of suspense as the officer stirs the logs and smokes out the fugitive, only to precipitate a real riot which results in the discomfiture of the "redcoats" and the loss of their arms.

There is further suspense as the prisoner, supplied by the priest with a file, works his way out of his window after his capture and condemnation. We see him singing to drown the noise of the tool—and those who know the player may at the moment wish they could have heard him; he was ten years in musical comedy. The climb along the ivy-covered wall furnishes an abundance of work even for steely muscles. Following the release of Eileen comes the real big situation—the kind that will stir a house. Eileen is being helped slowly down the wall. A soldier patrolling his post sees her just as she drops to the ground. He pounces on and grabs her. At that moment, from a height of ten feet above, Marty swings free and lands on the shoulders of the sentry. It requires no stretch of the imagination to believe that he did nearly break the man's neck. There is a smash with the file and the soldier goes to sleep.

Miss Gauntier is Eileen. She is the part, whether it be rowing, in real sailorman fashion, the boat across the lake, or in swimming it when the craft is taken away, or in the dangerous climb down the prison wall. Mr. Clark is Marty, the perfect type of the fearless Irish lad, as devoted to his sweetheart as he is bitter toward the rule represented by the soldiery. Mr. Olcott is impressive as the priest—reverent but also militant.

"For Ireland's Sake" is a good picture.

WHERE UNIVERSAL CAN BE SEEN.

Entire Program to be Shown to Exhibitors in New York Semi-Weekly at Republic Theater on Forty-Second Street.

Commencing Tuesday, January 20th, 1914, the Universal Film Exchange began showing, every Tuesday and Thursday, at 10:00 a. m., at the Republic Theater, its advanced releases for inspection by all exhibitors. This is an innovation in New York territory, but the company feels that the demands of the exhibitors will justify it. Besides giving the company's patrons an opportunity of viewing the program before running it in their own houses, it will acquaint other exhibitors with the quality of the Universal Program.

Admission will be by cards issued to the exhibitors only. The public will be excluded. These cards can either be obtained from the Universal exchanges, at 111 E. 14th Street, or 1600 Broadway, or at the Republic Theater on the days of exhibition. It is fully expected that every exhibitor in greater New York will take advantage of this opportunity. At the first exhibition on January 20th, the big feature "Absinthe," with King Baggot and Leah Baird, was presented.

KALEM BUILDS INCLOSED STUDIO AT JACKSONVILLE.

When the Kalem studio, at Jacksonville, Florida, is completed, that company will possess one of the most modern plants of its kind in existence. It is expected that the edifice will be ready for occupancy within four weeks.

A large sum has been expended to make this studio up-to-date and modern in every detail. Before the plans were drawn, the architects made a careful study of the various plants in the country. The Kalem building consequently embraces the most desirable features of these establishments.

The inclosed studio was found necessary because of the frequent interruption of work due to the vagaries of the weather. Heretofore, all the work has been done on the spacious outdoor plant which adjourns the new building. With the new studio in operation, work on Kalem productions will be carried on uninterruptedly.

An elaborate lighting plant of unusual efficiency has been installed. Nor has the comfort of the players been overlooked. The ventilation of the building is declared to be perfect.

One of the unusual features is embodied in the rear of the studio. This is made of glass and so arranged as to constitute immense sliding doors. When desired, these can be rolled apart to admit the sun's rays, or to allow unusually large "flats" to be taken in or out of the building.

Standing Room Question Before Board

Bill Introduced to Reduce It to a Definite Basis. Outlook Bad for Easy Licenses.

THE Committee on General Welfare of the New York Board of Aldermen has several proposed pieces of legislation affecting moving picture houses before it for consideration, all introduced by Alderman McCourt. The many arrests and convictions in the Court of Special Sessions of the proprietors of moving picture houses for blocking the aisles with standees, due to the action of the Fire Prevention Bureau in enforcing the laws, undoubtedly led to the introduction of the remedial legislation proposed by Alderman McCourt to afford relief to owners of houses who have put up substantial structures and allowed plenty of space for aisles.

It is proposed to amend the ordinance relative to motion picture theaters approved July 8th, 1913, so that paragraph nine will not be so drastic. These are the proposed amendments:

It shall be lawful to permit persons to stand in the aisles, passageways and space in the rear of the seats as follows:

(a) If the aisle, passageway or space be more than four feet and less than sixteen feet wide, persons may stand therein, provided an unobstructed passageway of at least four feet in width is left open in said aisle or passageway.

(b) If the aisle, passageway or space be more than sixteen feet wide, persons may stand therein, provided an unobstructed passageway of at least eight feet in width be left open in said aisle or passageway.

(c) If the aisle, passageway or space be four feet or less in width and there be an outer passageway in the rear of the auditorium, to which all aisle heads have direct access, it shall be lawful to permit two rows of persons to stand in said aisle, passageway or space in the rear of the seats.

(d) In balconies or galleries one row of persons.

(e) In no event, nor under any circumstances, shall any person be permitted to stand at the head of any aisle. The space to be occupied by said persons shall be separated by tape, ribbon or other easily broken material, supported by light posts fixed in stationary sockets, and to be not less than three nor more than four feet from the floor; all to be so constructed and placed as to be no obstruction in case of panic or emergency.

Any manager, proprietor, usher, agent or employee who shall violate any of the provisions of this section shall severally pay a penalty in the sum of fifty dollars ($50) for each violation.

Sec. 2. This ordinance shall take effect immediately.

The proposed ordinance to regulate and control the licensing of motion picture theaters calls for the issuing of the license by the mayor provided these particulars are furnished:

A—Applicants for motion picture theater licenses shall file plans and specifications of the motion picture theater contemplated to be licensed with the Bureau of Buildings of the borough in which the motion picture theater is to be situated, and must file a copy of such plans and specifications duly approved by the Superintendent of Buildings with the application for the license, which application shall be made to the Bureau of Licenses on blanks furnished by it for that purpose.

B—Any person who is the owner, lessor or lessee of a building or piece of land in or upon which a motion picture theater is to be operated shall sufficiently in advance thereof prepare and make upon the blank which shall be furnished by the Bureau of Licenses a statement signed and sworn to by such applicant or applicants, or when made by a person in behalf of a corporation or association, the following statements of fact:

1. The name of each applicant and, if there be more than one and they be partners, also their partnership name, and the age and residence of the several persons so applying, and the fact as to his citizenship.

2. The name and residence of every person interested or to become interested in such motion picture theater for which the statement is made, unless such applicant be a corporation or association, in which case the person making the application in behalf of the corporation or association will set forth, instead, the name of the corporation or association, the State under the laws of which it is organized, and the nature of his authority to act for such corporation or association.

3. The premises where such business is to be carried on, stating the street and number, if the premises have a street and number, and otherwise such apt description as will reasonably indicate the locality thereof; but no license for the operation of a motion picture theater shall be issued for any land or premises the location of which shall be on the same street or avenue and within two hundred feet of a building occupied exclusively as a church or school house; the measurements to be taken in a straight line from the center of the nearest entrance of the place in which it is desired to operate a motion picture theater.

Sec. 2. This ordinance shall take effect immediately.

Paragraph three of this proposed ordinance will undoubtedly make the procuring of a license very difficult as almost the same conditions are necessary in procuring licenses for saloons.

A proposed amendment to the ordinance in reference to "signs and showbills" allows posters to be displayed on the sides of buildings with the consent of the owners, and also allows posters to be displayed ten feet in the clear above the sidewalks.

Tickets of admission to theaters or moving picture houses must have the prices stamped on them if this new ordinance is adopted, the provisions of which are:

Be It Ordained, by the Board of Aldermen of The City of New York, as follows:

Section 1. The owners, lessees, managers and other persons in charge of or conducting any duly licensed theater, concert hall, circus, common show or other place of public amusement by whatever name or term designated and also of all other places of public amusement for which no license is required by law, the right of permission to attend which, or to attend any entertainment or performance thereat or therein is regulated by the issue of any ticket or other evidence of license or contract for which a fee or money consideration is charged, shall cause all tickets of admission or other evidences of license or right of entry issued by him, it or them to have legibly and conspicuously printed or stamped on the face thereof the true and actual price, fee or money consideration at or for which such ticket or evidence of license or right to admission is originally issued and sold.

Sec. 2. Any person violating any of the provisions hereof, shall, upon conviction before a City Magistrate, be punished by a fine not exceeding ten dollars for each offense, and in default of payment of any fine so imposed shall be committed to the City Prison for a term not exceeding ten days, each day of said imprisonment to be taken as a liquidation of each dollar of such fine.

Sec. 3. This ordinance shall take effect thirty days after its approval by the Mayor.

There are no signs of any proposed "censorship" ordinance being introduced into the new board thus far. M. P. J.

"In the Python's Den"

A Three Part Apex Feature.

The title of this subject is much more creepy than the picture itself. The name lends itself well to outside display advertising, wherein can be conjured up coils upon coils of mammouth serpents scattered here and there in lithographs in a manner quite terrifying to timid souls passing the theater. But the serpents in the picture are much like Bottom's lion in "Midsummer Nights Dream," of which animal snug, the joiner says: "For if I should as lion come in strife into this place 'twere pity of my life."

The pythons, like all well behaved serpents, keep out of sight until they are wanted, and when wanted do as they are expected to do, which is not much. All they have to do is crawl out and crush the daylights out of the villainous Hindoo prince and their act is through.

Scene from "In the Python's Den" (Apex).

It might be well to say that there are some circumstances leading up to the man-crushing scene which are more or less interesting, depending largely upon one's liking for things East Indian. The plot revolves about the covetousness of a Hindoo prince for a British army captain's wife. Not finding conditions favorable to an easy wooing he abducts the lady to his castle in the hills. The husband follows with an armed force to her rescue. He is captured and thrown into the python's den. His men storm the castle and rescue him from the snakes, leaving the prince to be crushed by them instead of the captain.

There are numerous scenes of harem life which are all very elaborate. The exciting scenes begin when the soldiers meet and fight the henchmen of the prince. There are numerous skirmishes and escapes that are exciting and acceptably done. The scene in the pythons' den is the climax. The pythons are there and we see them coiled about the prince, but we will have to take the producer's word that they crushed the prince. If this picture frightens any fair lady 'twere pity of our life.

Two "Features Ideal" Worth Noticing

"The Fugitive" and "Fatality and Mystery," New Subjects from the Savoya Studio Will Appeal to Different Kinds of Spectators.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

IT IS interesting to notice in the two recent "Features Ideal" offerings that one has been designed to please the art-loving spectator, while the other, making less demands on cultivated understanding and being itself less logical and less artistic, has a far more popular quality. This latter picture tells a conventional story dealing with emotions that are homely and with appeal to the people. We will give an account of "Fatality and Mystery," the artistic one, first; it will be much pleasanter to talk about and is far more deserving than "The Fugitive," which experience makes us believe will be liked better. Both are good offerings.

"Fatality and Mystery."

"Fatality and Mystery" is a tragic love story full of heartbreak made real by poignantly simple acting and softened by beauty of set and background which the camera has captured in lovely pictures. It is a triangle story with the father of the accepted lover as the one who primarily opens the door to destruction. The opening scenes show us a bevy of young girls having a pleasant romp together in a beautiful garden. In keeping with the idyllic and poetic atmosphere in which the producer has started his picture, the promise of tragedy is at once suggested. The girls go to an old gypsy hag to have their fortunes told and the pretty heroine, owner of the garden, sees in the witch's caldron the image of a skull. Again the girls are back in their garden and a man is introduced who, in a scene most artistically handled by both actors and producer, manages to get the heroine aside long enough to propose to her and be refused.

With delightful simplicity the actress makes us see clearly that there is another man whom she loves passionately and when he is presented we find him in appearance all that such a girl could desire. Quickly the sinister father of this young man comes into the picture with a demand for more money which the son refuses. The old man, in his son's absence, steals some money from a desk and leaves a note. This money, we find, is not the son's but was intrusted to him and he is not able to make its loss good. The father, drinking with fast women, refuses to give any of it back.

The son being deep in love and fearing disgrace, attempts to recoup by gambling and is losing when he picks up a card from the floor and plays it and, caught cheating, hurries out in shame. Schiller in his "Aesthetic Letters," which is a very high authority on art, says that it is never safe to make the hero of a drama do anything petty, such as taking a friend's table silver or cheating at cards. In this case we can at least respect the man for not knowing how to cheat—his substituted card is of a different color and different size; he could hardly have known what he was doing. The unaccepted lover of the heroine is at the card table and, of course, takes his own dramatic time to "show up" the unfortunate youth. From this point, through beautiful scenes —we print a cut of one of these—the picture goes down into deeper tragedy until both lovers, in semi-madness, have destroyed themselves.

"The Fugitive."

Taken from an Italian novel which roughly means "The Man Who Is Legally Dead," this picture "The Fugitive," gives us the sad results of a family feud in Southern Italy. The son of one family has married the daughter of the other and later, in self defence so it seems, kills the brother of his wife. He is sent to prison for life. His wife, with the help of the charitable village doctor, brings her baby up ignorant of the fact that her father is in prison and thinking that the doctor is her father. The real father escapes and comes home. The dramatic suspense lies in the question, will the convict father consent to deny himself and let the child remain ignorant or, led by jealousy, how far will he go in his demands for his own? This situation is not wholly convincing and the subtitles are rather crude, but the players are artistic in their work and the characters, especially the old village priest, are pleasing. It is all very easy to comprehend and all its emotions are what the average spectator could imagine himself or herself as feeling. In fact, this is the best reason why it is a strong offering to please the many.

ECLAIR TO REMOVE TO NEW QUARTERS.

The Eclair Film Co. will shortly announce its removal to larger and more commodious quarters in a building situated in the heart of the new film center of the metropolis. Here, offices, developing and cutting room, projection rooms, etc., will be amply provided for. This move has been made necessary through the increase of the Eclair's business during the past year. The present offices, occupying an entire floor at 225 West 42nd Street, have served their purpose well enough, but have proved inadequate in which to transact the larger volume of film sales that have fallen to the lot of the concern recently.

Comedy film filled with laughs and action and telling a legitimate story and embracing many funny situations bordering on refined burlesque.

"The Day of Days."

Famous Players' Four-Part Extravaganza of City Life Will Make Good Entertainment.

By George Blaisdell.

IT IS a frankly extravagant phase of city life we see in this four-part production of the Famous Players in which Cyril Scott plays the hero in "The Day of Days," adapted from the novel of Louis Joseph Vance. It will make good entertainment, especially for those who prefer excitement to the more sombre dramatic situations. Of excitement there is much in the last half. The action is fast. Much time is given to the development, and in order that the later rapidly changing fortunes of the chief participants may be clear, we see that the attention to the working up of the story is worth while.

The picture is well staged, more particularly the scenes of the bazaar and the various rooms of the pretentious gambling house. The views of the humbler boarding house have an O. Henry touch that will appeal to the livers—and this expression contains no anatomical allusion—in these dwelling places in towns far from as well as in the metropolis. In the bazaar there are expert dancers who amuse others as well as themselves. The adventures in the palace of chance, where, after the hero breaks the bank, the owner tries to take the money from him, will thrill. The best of all is the descent of the detectives just in time to permit the winner to escape, in the purloined coat and cap, of a sleeping policeman. There is enough action here to suit anyone. It is a pursuit over fences and roofs, up a fire escape, and into an apartment. In this melodrama no jar is occasioned by the fact that the fugitive finds himself confronted by the woman who is just the one to tell him where he will find his sweetheart, concealed by gunmen. How the heiress is later rescued from the clutches of her gangster-employing guardian constitutes another episode of liveliness. There is the liveliest kind of a mix-up between detectives and many gangmen. In the picture are many scenes of well-known New York points.

The story centers about a young man who is in love with a girl proving to be an heiress and in disguise in order to get out of the power of a guardian. The news of her disappearance is printed in the newspapers, and through her photograph she is recognized, just a little incident which goes to prove that the production is an extravaganza. The guardian and his son are moving all the agencies they can command to get possession of the girl in the course of that day, as on the morrow she will be independent. What happens is a long story. Suffice it to say the old villain and the young villain are "foiled" and the right man gets the girl, and what is more wins $25,000 in Penfield's gambling house and gets it to his boarding house; as he engages a clergyman on short notice he finds the money very useful.

Cyril Scott is the athletic Perceval Sybarite, and he finds plenty of uses to which to put his ability. He gets out of his part all there is in it. Dave Wall is excellent as the son of the scheming guardian, the man about town who seeks to marry the heiress before his father's control over her fortune lapses. Hal Clarendon is convincing as the proprietor of the gambling house and also in the bit of play within a play where he carries the role of Hajj in "Kismet." There is a large supporting cast.

"A Modern Mephisto."

A Six Reel Offering with a Clear Story and Sensational Melodramatic Incidents.

Reviewed by H. C. Judson.

A NEW multi-reel offering by Green's Feature Photoplays has a villain of such low-down meanness that he furnishes one situation of most dramatic poignancy and many others of less but still marked interest. The object of the picture is a melodramatic presentation of situation after situation rather than a more complete development of any one tangle of human fates for the sake of its possible content of human emotion; its object is to excite the spectator rather than to awaken his sympathies; but it does the latter, too. It was taken in Italy amid many lovely natural backgrounds and has many perfectly contrived interior scenes. The photography is truly wonderful. The story is clear and the characters are interesting and well acted. The reviewer looking over his notes finds that the early reels, the first three, seemed slow to him; but at the end feels that the spectator who has seen it all will count the picture a "thriller." The latter half of it is full of big incidents. The subtitle of the story is "Or the Oath on the Bible," an oath the villain, a good-for-nothing adventurer of some artistic ability, takes swearing to be true to the Lady Alice, a daughter of Lord Villard, whom he has just married without her father's knowledge.

This choice villain, Rogers, has secretly married Lady Alice just for her money. She gives him her dead mother's jewels which he pawns and squanders on fast women. Her father sees her giving the gems and discovering the situation disowns her. With her old nurse she goes to her husband and finds him with two women in his studio and all three drunk. This is the picture's big situation and it is very effective. It is in the third reel. The Lady Alice is now living alone in her sorrow with her nurse. Her father dies and leaves her penniless. Rogers has become a counterfeiter and is captured after a sensational and freshly conceived chase from a cabaret restaurant, across its stage, to the roof and down again to the yard. Alice has become a circus rider and is living with her little son and the nurse in the suburbs. She is courted by Prince Tremayne, who is honorable and disinterested; but, of course, cannot permit his attentions.

Her precious husband has served his term and is let loose. He soon finds that she is at the circus. These circus scenes are lovely. The heroine, not a very attractive girl at first, has become charming in the several costumes in which she performs and the impression that the big circus house leaves is pleasing and convincing. The delectable villain spies on her, finds out about the prince and discovers where she is living with her son. His obtrusion into her little retreat makes a good scene, well acted and effective, and the incident closes with his snatching the boy and making off on a motor cycle. It happens that the prince is near and follows in a motor car, giving a good chase through new and interesting country to a bridge where a skillfully handled struggle takes place, ending with Rogers being thrown over the bridge by the prince's chauffeur. We are left to think him drowned and follow the prince back to console Alice. He is not yet dead. The prince makes another attempt to save the boy from him and sends the nurse with him to his castle by train. The sweet-savored villain is on the train and in a last tragic incident, the nurse sacrifices her life in order

BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN

THE motion picture cases now pending in New York City courts relative to merits of certain film productions, from a moral point of view, will go upon record as involving precedents having vital bearing upon all branches of the motion picture business, founded upon a final disposition of the indictments returned by the grand jury. Most of the people interested in the business have given the suits little more than passing notice because they entertain the same opinion expressed by a chief magistrate last week, namely: That the arrest of the people managing and handling the pictures involved in the litigation, and the closing by the police of the houses exhibiting the pictures, was press agent work. It has not been shown that the suits were precipitated for that purpose, but the fact that a chief magistrate has so declared conveys the impression that something must have transpired to justify him in making the statement. There have been scores of cases in the New York courts in which actresses, finding their drawing power on the wane, have appeared as complainants for the sake of notoriety: but, within the memory of many of the oldest lawyers, the motion picture cases are the first in which the court saw fit to brand the proceedings as an advertising scheme. It is within the province of the courts to do so, but evidently they have not felt as indignant as Magistrate McAdoo, who resented the use of courts for advertising purposes.

But the press agent aspect of the case, whether or not it is a fact, is not of vital importance to the people directly connected with the manufacture, booking and exhibiting of motion pictures. That is a phase applying only to the people who resort to such tactics and the people who patronize the exhibitions, although a well known producer has said it is poor business policy to force the authorities into action in order to get a police court endorsement as to the moral aspect of a picture and resort to such tactics serves too often to still more belittle the business as a whole in the eyes of people who are unrelenting enemies of motion pictures. In the opinion of this producer the pictures must stand upon their merits before the people, regardless of any court endorsement. "I do not know that it was press work in the present cases," said the producer. "In giving my views I do not refer to them. I have made the statements with the hope that they will carry weight and that, for the benefit of the business in general, none will resort to such advertising schemes."

The vital points of interest in the existing litigations are several in number. Among them is one involving the question as to how close to the danger line can a motion picture go in teaching a moral lesson. The National Board of Censors and other organizations have given this subject such exhaustive attention that they eventually dispelled a formidable clamor against motion pictures by an unduly sensitive element that seemed determined to put them out of business. For several months peace has reigned and, to many, it seems unfortunate that the contentions should be revived. The lawyers representing the people prosecuted have had the cases transferred to a higher court than that in which they were originally instituted on the ground that the cases involve intricate questions of fact and law, including property rights. This development has caused many people in the picture business to favor the renewal of the battle. They maintain it will be a good thing to have a determination of the moral question by the courts, provided the decision will be in such form that producers and exhibitors may be able intelligently to determine when they are within the law.

"I do not care how the question is settled," said one producer, "so long as all parties concerned are given an opportunity to be heard and the decision is based upon equality to all interests. That is all we ask. Like others, I regret that the subject has been resurrected. Perhaps a judicial determination will repay the time, labor and expense it will involve. My sole wish is that it will set the question at rest and deter from entering the business people who have inclinations to tempt a test of it. The present cases are in court and the determination as to the moral aspect of the pictures involved should be allowed to rest there. Nothing is more foreign to my mind than a desire to anticipate the decision that may be arrived at in the cases; but I want to say that any production that tends to discourage the patronage of women is a poor asset to have on hand and tends to jeopardize the interests of all concerned in the motion picture business. In commenting upon the presentation of one of the films involved in the suits, the New York correspondent to The Billboard says:

> A moving picture in three reels of the "Victim of Sin," a story based on the disease most dreaded by humanity. (Referring to its position on the program.) The film is interesting throughout and its photography and double exposures are well done. Many women left the auditorium before the film was entirely finished. There is nothing for the producers of this picture to be ashamed of as, in fact, it teaches a moral lesson.

"I have every reason to believe in the integrity of the correspondent quoted and his desire to be fair to both the producers and the public; but, in view of his own statement, I cannot agree with him in putting the O. K. stamp on the pictures he speaks of, from a business standpoint. The women and children were the first to give patronage to the motion pictures. It took time for the men to 'get the habit,' and even today the women are in the majority as patrons; so producers cannot be too careful in the preparation of subjects. The fact that a moral is conveyed will not carry a picture through if the method by which it is finally presented is likely to offend. Motion pictures are being produced so numerously that it is difficult to avoid a similarity of titles. Now if the woman The Billboard correspondent speaks of having retired from the show left the place because the details disgusted them it is quite natural to assume that they would avoid any other productions of similar titles, although they may be subjects of the highest class both as to art and moral tone. There is an old saying 'there would be no ill language if it were not taken,' and possibly many will say that if the mind were kept upon the moral developed in a subject there could be no offense; but that kind of logic will not be accepted by the amusement public as a whole."

Another important feature involved in the pending cases relates to censorship. About a year ago, when there was a great turmoil over the effect of motion pictures upon the morals of children, those opposed to the agitation maintained that the pictures were being properly censored and there was no need of a city or state board of censorship. It was further claimed that, should the authorities find a motion picture improper from a moral standpoint, there were ample laws in force to enable them to stop its production. It would seem that this contention was well founded. In the existing cases the police, magistrate, district attorney and grand jury have gone the limit, which they could not have done if they did not have laws to back them up. It is said the power of the authorities to interfere is to be one of the chief bones of contention at the trials. In the opinion of many eminent lawyers this power is vested by the existing laws, but the trials may determine how and to what extent the authorities may go in exercising that power. "In my opinion," said one lawyer, "the court may make a ruling, or suggest some legislation, by which the power may be restricted from a censorship point of view in order that it may not be abused and people ignorantly or maliciously prosecuted. One of the complaints is that an indecent exhibition was made and it is up to the jury to decide if such was the case. In its charge to the jury, the court will, no doubt, so touch upon indecent exhibitions that much of the doubt now existing as to what really constitutes offense to the refinement of sensibility will be wiped out, thus warning producers as to how near the line they may go, and the police as to when they may act."

"WHITE SLAVE" PICTURE PROMOTERS INDICTED.

A New York grand jury voted indictments on Friday, January 16, against Samuel H. London, the writer of the story upon which the moving picture play "The Inside of the White Slave Traffic," was founded; John H. Heagney, manager for London, and Harry C. Bohn, manager of the Bijou Theater, which was raided by the police while the film play was being presented there. Several ticket sellers and other employes of the Park and Bijou Theaters, who were arrested when the film was shown, were not held by the grand jury.

The indictments followed a private exhibition of the films attended by the grand jurors themselves, who were anxious to see if the picture play was fit for the public. They quickly decided that it was not, and the three indictments charging misdemeanor in each instance followed.

J. Searle Dawley, Producer

Famous Players Director Gives Interesting Talk on the Art of Making Motion Pictures.

By George Blaisdell.

STAGE stars are not unamenable to the advice and guidance of motion picture directors, says J. Searle Dawley, of the Famous Players. "All of them have been fine to work with," said Mr. Dawley in a chat the other day. "I have not had a bit of trouble." The director was answering a question as to whether in dealing with prominent stage persons he had noted any manifestation of the temperamental eccentricities more or less commonly ascribed to talented dramatic performers.

Although Mr. Dawley has been directing the making of motion pictures nearly seven years, he has never appeared in a picture. When in May, 1907, he was engaged by Edwin S. Porter (now technical director of the Famous Players as he was then manager of production for the Edison Company) to take charge of the stage work of his company, Mr. Dawley had been five years in stock in Brooklyn. In that time he had written eighteen plays, all of which have been produced. The director confessed that between his stage work and his dramatic writing there was not much opportunity for recreation. It was undoubtedly Mr. Porter's knowledge of what Mr. Dawley had accomplished that led to the engagement of the latter by President Zukor of the Famous Players on June 8th last.

J. Searle Dawley.

Mr. Dawley admitted that his experience in stock and as a playwriter had stood him in good stead in the making of pictures. The combination had given him an insight into the different methods of construction. He is still a close student of the art of the drama as exemplified in the stage successes of America and Europe, especially as to the building up of a climax. "Construction is one of the big secrets of successful motion picture making," said Mr. Dawley. "A first-class stage director will be able to handle a motion picture provided he is given a properly devised scenario. Many directors will take a scenario and start right in to produce it without first carefully studying it. They may fall down if they have no knowledge of construction. Mr. Plimpton, of the Edison Company, is wise in his methods of handling a new director. He used to give to the beginner a script by Bannister Merwin because it was certain to be properly written. This cannot be said of 75 per cent. of the scripts that are given into the hands of the average director.

"Scenario writers? Most assuredly are they one of the greatest needs of the day. I agree with you that sufficient inducement is not being generally given to scenario writers. When we consider the profit that flows from the sale of a thousand feet of film in spite of the fact it may have cost thousands of dollars to produce the allowance of $25 for the script from which it is made does seem out of all proportion. Yet there are many companies that make that figure their standard."

"In view of all the pictures now being produced, what is your opinion of the way conditions will eventually work out?" the writer asked.

"Why," said Mr. Dawley, "I have an idea the result in the larger cities will be three classes of houses. There will be the first-class theater, which shows only first-class subjects. Then we will have houses devoted to the melodrama, the sensational. Finally, there will be what is now represented on the stage by burlesque, showing risque stuff, for which, I am sorry to say, there seems to be a demand. In spite of the detrimental effect on the business as a whole, I don't believe we are going to get away from the white slave subjects, if we may judge by the big trade they seem to be drawing. Some men will do anything for money, and it is hard to say what some won't try to do.

"The high-class houses will draw those who seek entertainment as distinguished from amusement. Colored photography will be a big step. It is bound to come. It will give directors a chance to study the psychology of colors, which means a great deal to the eye. You can reach the mind through color as well as through movement. Colors are going to enter more and more into artistic pictures. It is one of the big secrets every director has got to look into. Very often now a director leaves to a cameraman those things he should not—things he must know himself.

"It has often seemed to me," said the writer, "that the cameraman of to-day may be the director of the future. Surely he has many advantages in the way of training."

"I have found as a general thing," said Mr. Dawley in response to the suggestion, "that the mind of the cameraman is on a mechanical basis and that it is rare to find one built on artistic lines. One may be temperamental, but not artistic. Unless one appreciates the beautiful things of life he cannot be a successful director. The director must feel the atmosphere of a story just as must the player. Do I plot out the business of the characters in advance? Oh, no; I may not two seconds beforehand be aware what I am going to tell a player to do. I simply let myself go and say, 'This is what the character would do.' I try to feel for that instant what the person would go through under those mental conditions.

"No, no director can make every picture a success. One real good picture in five is doing well. Just take our stage productions right here in New York. Out of twenty plays you will hardly find five top-notchers. One of our greatest theatrical producers has said that he would willingly pay $50,000 a year to a reader of plays who could pick successes. Motion picture work is the more problematical of the two divisions. When you finish a picture you are not sure what the result will be. Sometimes it is a simple turn that when made seemed negligible that will prove to be just the right thing—and sometimes it will prove to be the wrong thing.

"Is it safe to assume that a strong play will make a strong picture? No, I do not think so. Very often when you read a play you see it won't do for the screen. Very few plays will. Play construction and stage construction are two different things. If in the play there are wonderful lines you must forget them. You must remember that on the screen the words are unspoken. There it is the action that counts."

"Do you think, Mr. Dawley, talking pictures—of which, by the way, we do not nowadays hear so much—will in any way threaten the present supremacy of the silent screen?"

"No," was the prompt response, "I do not. One of the reasons why motion pictures have such popular appeal is because each individual follower of a scene is putting his own language into the mouth of the actor. In other words, the actor is talking in the vocabulary of the observer—be the same limited and simple or extensive and scholarly. In the talking picture the man out front hears the language of the writer of the story."

Mr. Dawley had a word to say as to the indifference of some operators in regard to their projection. "I have known occasions when in looking at subjects I had produced I have seen accomplished in a few seconds the utter ruin of a situation in the building up of which I had given many hours of careful thought and in the proper staging of which many, many dollars had been expended. Just so that a house may be quickly cleared an operator—and it is to be regretted that often he will be following his instructions—will spoil for a thousand men and women a dramatic pause that marks the big situation of a production and consequently minimize in their opinion the worth and quality of the subject."

Mr. Dawley has had wide experience in making pictures far from home. On January 24th he will sail for Cuba with thirty players. Accompanying the party will be Daniel Frohman, managing director of the Famous Players, the first of the great stage producers to realize the potentialities of the screen. It is not Mr. Dawley's first visit to Cuba in a similar capacity. So also has he made trips to Bermuda. He is said to have been the first director to head a company of screen artists across the continent to the Pacific. Here is the itinerary of one of these journeys: New York to Chicago, to Denver, to Colorado Springs, to Cheyenne, where was taken the famous single reel "Charge of the Light Bridage"; then came Salt Lake City, Yellowstone Park, Brigham, San Francisco; then into the heart of the Sierra Forest to do a bit of work for Uncle Sam; and afterward Monterey, Los Angeles, Santiago, Long Beach, the Grand Canyon and Omaha.

Of "The Charge of the Light Brigade" 309 prints were sold in England. So impressed was Lord Roberts with the accuracy of the production that he wrote a complimentary letter to the company.

In the talk with Mr. Dawley there were told many deeply interesting anecdotes of his experiences in the making of pictures. A mighty good story and a thrilling one as well covered the making of "The Charge of the Light Brigade," in which soldiers from Fort D. A. Russell took a prominent part. And there were many others.

Moving Picture Educator

The Kite, a Film for Boys.

THIS Eclair film of the boys famous outdoor sport of kite flying will, in the first place, be eagerly seen by boys everywhere, while it possesses equal interest for others.

The first part of the film shows kite flying in China, where as in other parts of the world, the kite has given joy to children and peace to parents. To the average American boy, to whom the style and fashion of kites is exceedingly limited, the Chinese kites will prove very attractive. There are kites shaped like birds, fishes, and even lengthy dragons, which are framed after the manner of a series of round box-kites. It would seem that with such a variety of elaborate and successfully flying contrivances that the Chinese ought to have gone further in the adaptation of the kite for more practical purposes; fantastic shapes, however, seem to have been the hobby, and no desire further than the plaything seems to have absorbed them.

The modern kite is shown as built on scientific lines only, avoiding the oriental style, and paving the way for developments, without taking away any of the old style pleasures.

A Kite Duel.

While most boys have enjoyed kite flying contests, few have seen such a fighting contest as is seen on this film. A sharp knife is tied to the tail of each kite, the rule being for the adversaries to fly round in circles, the object of each being to cut the string of the opponent's kite by means of the knife on the tail. The pictures show an attack, a coming together, the successful cutting of one by the other, and, the victor.

The Kite a Motive Power.

Pictures are shown of kites pulling baby carriages along the seashore, and pulling sailboats on the water with great speed. They are also seen lifting heavy weights and similar feats. The film is perhaps the most interesting of its kind. It is new and attractive; more especially, it is suggestive of greater possibilities.

Orchids.

Horticultural films would not be complete without the aristocratic orchid; unattractive as a plant, yet most superior as a flower, combining grace and beauty to the greatest degree. Tender and delicate by nature, its great value is enhanced by the costliness of the surroundings, care and attention which it demands. In special forcing houses—small magical factories—where orchids are grown, the skill of the orchid lover puts to shame the splendors of those of tropical bloom. It is interesting to be shown one special piece of attention given to these flowers. Little green frogs are procured and placed to run over the flowers to destroy mischievous and destructive insects. Fumigation, which suffices to destroy insects in almost every other plant or flower, cannot be permitted to endanger the delicate orchid, hence the need of that lilliputian insect-eater, the green frog.

One of the most interesting pictures shows the growing and opening of some beautiful specimens, that which nature requires a week to accomplish is shown on the screen in less than a minute. Specimens like the Ciprypedium "The Shoe of Venus," wonderful in shape and of the richest delicacy of coloring, are shown, also the producing of new species by transferring the pollen of one flower to the pistil of another.

Hermit Crabs.

Another of those natural history subjects, which reveals the otherwise hidden secrets of nature, comes with this film from the Eclair bureau of scientific research.

The hermit crabs are so named because of their habits of making their home in the shell of another specimen after devouring the previous tenant before taking possession; every detail of this invasion is depicted on the screen and is followed with keen interest.

However, should any attempt be made to evict the hermit crab from the home he has purloined, he will suffer himself to be pulled apart rather than surrender or abandon his abode. How they live and are caught in nets near the seashore is explained. Sometimes the crab will make a home in a sea anemone. The peculiar construction of the head, magnified, shows the eyes at the end of stalks surmounted by antennae. Although impossible to draw the crab from a shell without pulling it apart, should a worm find its way in the shell and there grow, the tenacious crab is soon filled with dread and voluntarily withdraws itself; as, while great fighters, they are easily driven off by a worm.

Among themselves the crabs are seen to be great fighters where food is concerned. Most minute details are shown upon the screen, here, as in all these natural history subjects, unknown details are magnified and elaborated, giving valuable lessons upon forms of life hitherto too small to permit of examination.

Kinematography and Stenography.

The high sounding title which suggests a relationship between these two sciences, means when simplified that shorthand is now taught by moving pictures; surely if this is successful there would seem to be nothing left in which the moving picture may not excel as a teacher. The value of moving picture films for teaching the Isaac Pitman system of shorthand is being successfully demonstrated by the Merchants and Bankers School, of Newark, N. J. Principal A. J. Harding, who originated the scheme, has been working on it for the past year, and recently began its use in the shorthand department. The moving picture film idea is not only agreeable and pleasing, but is an incentive to the student to accomplish more; for the reason that he is appealed to from a more interested point of view; a fact common to all applications of the moving picture in teaching.

"Nothing Educational About It."

These title words were given expression to by the mayor of a prominent town in close proximity to New York City. Certain pictures had caused much comment and discussion and the question of the value of the picture came before the mayor in an official capacity. With commendable honesty he would not pass upon the picture until he had seen it for himself. Taking advantage of the fact that a great deal had been made of the "educational features" of the picture (everybody knows now—even advertisers—that to "draw and hold," the educational features must prevail), this worthy mayor naturally looked for that in the picture which had been most emphasized. Finding a singular lack in that particular, he refused to permit an exhibition in his own town because "there was nothing educational about it." There is no need to mention the name of the picture or any of the attending circumstances. It is now sufficient to point out that abuse must not be made of educationalism in kinematography to attract and then deceive. To tell anyone even a truth and a fact, which does not increase the mental and moral fibre, is injurious and therefore not educational.

It seems that there are some people who think that if a thing is true, even if evil, the knowledge of it is educational; hence the excuse—not the reason—for putting in picture subjects that would be better buried.

There is a pit of oblivion which can never be filled, and into which much that is true and real had better be thrown rather than given the light of the screen. Educationalism is positive, and purely progressive, and under its guise there must not be foisted upon the people that which has "nothing educational about it."

Another Church Installation.

The Roman Catholic Church of Our Lady of Consolation has the honor of being the first church in Rhode Island to endorse the pictures for Sunday afternoon exhibition. Since last November there have been regular Sunday afternoon exhibitions in the hall of the parochial school, under the auspices of the rector of the parish, the Reverend Father

Joseph C. Bessette, who has become an enthusiastic believer in the educational value of the Kinematograph. Two exhibitions are given each Sunday, one for children, in the afternoon, immediately after the catechism (i.e. Sunday-school), the other in the evening for boys and young men from fifteen to twenty-five years old. The pictures range all the way from historical, Biblical, literary and patriotic, down to light comedy and drama, the only limitations being that the pictures must be clean and wholesome, teach a moral lesson, and be free from the objectionable "kissing finale." The pictures are accompanied by an informal lecture and by inspiring and enlivening music from a first-class, electrically-played piano, that was specially installed for the purpose.

The results have been most gratifying. Father Bessette's idea originally was to find a means to keep the smaller children off of the street and away from moral harm and at the same time keep young men away from drug stores where liquor is sold and from the places where cards are played for gain on Sunday evenings. Not only are these results being accomplished in a most gratifying manner, but Father Bessette adds:

> While I am keeping the children and young men away from temptation and evil associations and thus helping them morally, I am at the same time giving them the very best kind of educational help.
> Children, and even older folk, learn a great deal from motions. They may read about historical matters and gather more or less understanding of the subjects, but they learn more in one hour viewing the pictures and listening to crisp explanations than they would by days or weeks of reading about the same subjects. The baby learns the meaning of the word "love" when the mother presses it to her breast and kisses it; the deaf-mute learns the significance of things by signs and actions. In the same way the moving picture educates the masses and elevates the mind. The whole subject is so broad, and there is so much that can be accomplished for spiritual welfare and material advancement by the right use of the pictures, that any discussion as to whether they should be used or not seems to be absolutely superfluous. If we exclude the frivolous, and hold only to that which is calculated to build character, to instil respect for that which is uplifting, to encourage love of church, home and country, then we are pursuing the right and legitimate course.

Latest Educationals.

The Melies Company have at this season a complete list of new and instructive Japanese pictures. In sports they have "Shooting the Famous Hozu Rapids" and "Judo," and another commonly known as "Jiu Jitsu." Industrialism is enriched with "The Workings of a Lemon Plantation," and architecture by a series of pictures of "Temples of Japan." Manners and customs includes "A Japanese Wedding" and "A Shoemaker at Work." Scenic films include "A Trip to the Famous Picnic Grounds at Arashyma," also "At Phnom Phen, Cambodia," and "Harbor and Town of Sidney." Other scenics just issued include "Ascending Sugar Loaf Mountain" (Essanay); "Snow Effects in Austria" and "Nice and Its Environs," by Pathe. The Kalem Company has two industrials "Talcum Powder" and "Making Cut Glass;" and the Edison Company follow with a very good series showing the products of the palm, banana and cocoanut. Natural history is enriched by films showing "African Sea Birds" (Edison), and "Insects That Sing" (Pathe). For the first time we are given a glimpse of Hungarian scenery in a series of views by the Lux Company entitled "Travels in Hungary"; also one of "Ostrich Farming Near Nice." Each of these pictures is a valuable and appropriate addition to its respective class, the list of which is steadily growing so that the time cannot be far distant when a completed course of sufficient consecutive value will be ready for systematic educational work.

Progressive Picture Work.

In New Jersey, State, County and City authorities are allied in using the motion pictures in many educational ways. The civic festival in Jersey City for the Christmas and New Years observances gave free exhibitions of the "Manger to the Cross" pictures, as an appropriate part of the new method of educating the crowds to the exclusion of the former din and racket which were considered necessary at this season of the year.

In Trenton, a week of pictures illustrating the evils of tuberculosis, their prevention and cure, with lectures by Dr. Millard Knowlton, State health inspector, prove the ever increasing value of the social and moral welfare influences of the educational pictures. At the present time it seems that the moving picture is more prominently engaged in fighting battles against disease, moral and social evils than anything else; may the grand work continue with thanks to their powers.

Capt. Scott South Pole Pictures and Lecture.

Bostonians will have the first opportunity of seeing the Capt. Scott South Pole Expedition in motion pictures January 26th. On that date the Gaumont Company will present "The Undying Story of Captain Scott," together with "Animal Life in the Antarctic" at Tremont Temple.

The entertainment is composed of 6,700 feet of film, which represent the choicest subjects selected from the 25,000 feet of film made by Herbert G. Ponting, F. R. G. S., of London, while with the late Captain Scott in the Antarctic, as well as the remarkable still pictures taken by the immortal dead at the South Pole. Harry E. Humphreys, the well-known elocutionist of the Edison Company, will lecture the pictures.

EARL METCALFE.

IT DOES not often happen that a man so well endowed with good looks chooses to obscure them in character make-ups as is Earl Metcalfe's preference; but the delineation of the unusual in human nature appeals strongly to the young Lubin actor, and it is in such roles that he has won his greatest spurs.

Earl Metcalfe.

Studious, ambitious, keenly observant, his talents are rapidly maturing at an age when most photoplayers are only feeling their way. People are his never-ending study, and after them come the plays of Ibsen and the stories of Poe and Kipling Subscriptions for every publication devoted to the photoplay keep him informed on every point before the film world. His interest is unflagging, his study unceasing, his modesty invariable.

Earl Metcalfe's destiny can lead him nowhere but the heights. He can pronounce 'Abgergevenny" just as readily as you and the rest of the world can't. That's because he was born there. It is somewhere in Wales, and he left it and sailed for the States as soon as he heard of the stars and stripes and Cincinnati. He was educated in the university of that city, studied for West Point, then he changed his mind about wanting to be a soldier and decided upon the stage as a profession. That was twelve years ago and since then he has played in big city stock, was leading man for Stella Hammerstein and juvenile man for Zelda Sears. He is a writer of short stories, but first of all, he is one of the Lubin Company's very best men at their Eastern studio. He is said to be terribly good-looking, but, after all, it is his sterling ability that makes him popular, not his looks.

THE LANGUAGE OF THE SCREEN.

In directing the production of motion pictures, when a director wishes the actors to pause to give time for the reading of a letter or other stage business, he calls "hold it," meaning to hold the action. During the production of Director Henry MacRae's picture "The Vagabond Soldier," at the Universal Pacific Coast studios, Mr. MacRae gave a green hand a bomb with instructions when it was to be lighted and when it was to be thrown into the scene. The action in the scene commenced. The director instructed the actors as the scene progressed and finally he called:

"Hold it, hold it, hold it."

The green hand thought he was being addressed. He held it and he is now in the hospital at Universal City suffering from a burned hand and arm.

CLINTON, WIS., HAS NEW PICTURE HOUSE.

The Gem, a moving picture theater in Clinton, Wis., was opened on Christmas. Both matinee and evening performances were crowded to the doors. Manager Miller feels greatly encouraged over the success of his start. According to newspaper reports, the Gem can be compared favorably with any other picture house in a city the size of Clinton.

Music for the Picture

Conducted by CLARENCE E. SINN

Wants a Better Definition.

TORONTO, Canada, writes:

> I notice your department frequently mentions in slighting terms "concert music" or "concert programs" in connection with music for the picture. Will you kindly state just what you mean by these terms? My own impression, backed up by some years of experience, is that nearly any kind of good music may find a place upon a concert program—and often music which is not very good may sometimes be similarly favored. Strauss Waltzes, polkas (and even quadrilles at one time), modern popular songs and dances, operatic selections, salon music, folk songs and dances—all these and more may be found on popular concert programs as well as symphonies and other serious compositions. Do you mean to say such music is to be excluded? If so, what have you left to play that is worth hearing or playing?

It is true I have railed quite frequently, and then some, against "concert programs" as an accompaniment (?) to moving pictures. The correspondent probably is not aware or does not consider the fact that a great many—too many—musicians lay out a musical program without the least regard of its fitness to the pictures being shown. Evidently this is often done without trying to learn in advance what the nature of the pictures will be. There will be an overture, a set of standard waltzes perhaps, a selection or medley (sometimes both), and a few shorter numbers to fill out the time with usually a short wait after each number; exactly as it would be played on a concert stage and exactly as it should not be done in a moving picture theater. It is this sort of thing which, for want of a better name, I have referred to as a "concert program." And this department is not alone in its objection to incongruous music. Surely, anybody with a love for pictures in his heart would prefer them with an appropriate musical accompaniment or with no music at all. And appropriate music does not mean the exclusion of good music; the best is none too good, but whether it be the best or some other kind it should be in harmony with the picture and not in opposition. Some time ago a correspondent complained of an orchestra which played "The Light Cavalry" overture for a pretty little love story and ended (with the finale, of course) "slap-bang" in the middle of a quiet scene. That is the sort of concert program music I have "spoken slightingly" of. I know it is not always easy—not always convenient—sometimes well nigh impossible to choose the right things, but let us do the best we can under the circumstances.

A Couple of Fans.

C. P., Wisconsin, says:

> My brother and I are running a picture theater here. My brother (who operates the machine) has Richardson's Handbook and regards it as his Bible. Why don't you get out a book on picture music? There is room for a good one and I believe you could give it to us. I am an old repertoire pianist and have little trouble "playing-up" to dramatic pictures, as I accompany them much as I would similar situations in plays. We have taken the Moving Picture World ever since we have been in the business and couldn't do without it. I wish to say that in my belief the nature of your music should depend a great deal on the taste of your public. You've got to consider it first—business is business you know.

On behalf of Richardson, I will say your appreciation is appreciated. As to your suggestion anent the book on picture music, will say I am engaged on such a work, but other matters have delayed its completion. Your remark that the character of your music depends on the taste of your public is well put. But I think we should cultivate that taste so far as possible. Some audiences want plenty of popular music; some want noisy music; some want both. Others care for neither. Some delight in sound effects; some do not. For those who prefer popular music it is a good idea to play song choruses, "rags," etc., in the comedies. When they want sound effects (as most of them do), make these effects correctly and consistent. Don't use a drum roll and crash for a man sliding down a snow bank; when the horses are crossing a river or soft ground, don't make a noise as if they were clattering down a stone pavement.

When your audience likes a better grade of music, give them the best you can. My own preference is for such numbers as the intermezzo, reverie, novelette, cavatina, caprice, waltz and salon music generally, as these can be curtailed or repeated to fit the length of the scene. Play good music, and fit the picture, both as to length and character of the scenes. Personally, I prefer the music to be very soft—pianissimo—just a suggestion of music with a swell here and there when needed to intensify certain scenes. But tastes vary and as you say, business is business; the public must be served.

Suggestions for Music.

From Omaha, Neb.:

> Why don't you give us some more suggestions for music for the new releases? It has been a long time since any of these have appeared.

For two reasons. First, the very few which could be given each week were as a drop in the bucket compared with the large number released in the same time; again, it is often impossible to see the pictures until the day of release and my "suggestions" would then appear a week or more later; too late to be of any benefit to a great many. The second reason is that such suggestions are necessarily crude—in the very nature of things it is impossible to suggest numbers which everybody has. The majority of readers seem to think that when a piece of music was named I recommended that particular number and nothing else would do, whereas (as I explained every few weeks), I always confined myself to a few pieces which I hoped everybody was familiar with, the idea being that they could select something from their own library of similar character. I don't think they will appear again; at least, not in just that way.

The character of pictures previously mentioned were "Comedy" (both light and farce), "Drama" and "Melodrama." The distinction between the two last named was made, as explained, for the purpose of musical classification only. Some others you might classify as follows:

Historical Dramas. Usually martial, romantic or religious. Avoid the more modern music, especially up-to-date waltzes and popular music generally. Try to fit the time and nation when possible. War dramas often come under this head and offer opportunity for national airs and war tunes of the period. These, of course, will often call for ponderous, noisy "hurries" in the battle scenes and ballad's of the time and period for the sad or sentimental scenes. In pictures of ancient history standard 4/4 marches (like "Reine de Saba," etc.), will be found useful, as well as numbers from standard operas. Try to play music of the higher order wherever possible, but don't play a standard overture and let it go at that. Try to fit the scenes in this as in other pictures.

Biblical Pictures. Of a grave dignified character throughout. Standard church music (not the Moody and Sankey songs), grandioso movements and ponderous marches when marches are required. Masses and Te Deums. Avoid anything suggestive of modern music.

Tragedies. (Shakespearean order.) Music is stately, massive and always serious. Marches in 4/4 time; heavy "hurries" for battle scenes and combats. Gavottes and polonaises for fill-in purposes. Dances are usually the gavotte and minuet. No waltzes, two-steps or anything suggestive of modern music. For pathetic scenes use standard numbers or ballads of the period.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Talking to Bill.

EVIDENTLY Bill is going straight down the line of experience, for his last letter was about prize schemes for building up patronage. This is the reply.

Dear Bill,

Kiddies have to have mumps and measles and whooping cough and things like that before they can hope to regard themselves as seasoned, and the new manager has to get through certain ideas before he can put R. M. after his name, which the same means more or less Regular Manager.

I could give you a couple of earfuls of stuff about prize schemes, but what's the use? There is just one prize scheme and that's the scheme of giving such a good show that it draws. This is a little slower than turning loose a crate of chickens or something like that, but it is more lasting and it's the only way to solder down a business so it will stay put.

Most men are gamblers and most women are bargain hunters: which is the feminine form of gamble. She buys something for 98c marked down from 99. If she can eventually see it, she wins. If she can't, she loses. Like all the rest, it's a losing game, but it's a game that most people like to play, and so a man goes to the theater as much to see if he can get something for nothing as to see the show. As long as you offer more stuff or better stuff than the other fellow does, why you win, but it's like sensation, you must keep building up until you have to borrow money to buy prizes with.

I've watched it here in New York. I know a house where they have some feature every evening except Saturday and some houses will presently come in Saturday, too. One of the orchestra men in a shop you and I know, says the real novelty of the week now comes on Saturday when they give the whole show. All the rest of the time they cut the show down to make room for these schemes.

It was a stunt started by the vaudeville and burlesque houses to fight the picture shows, but now the picture shows use the ideas to fight each other with and the time is long past since the schemes have been business bringers. Now they are business holders, but they must be kept going once they are started and they must keep going higher and higher.

There are lots of people who are willing to buy their flour at the grocery, their meat at the butcher's, their coal at the coal yard and their clothes at the tailor's. Why not make a bid for them? Put the money you might spend in prizes into a regular honest-to-goodness show.

The Second.

This seems to be the second of two very interesting advertisements of the Colonial Theater, Green Bay, Wis. We are sorry that we have not the first. Perhaps the management will send it in for use by others next Christmas or perhaps in the summer school vacation time. If matter is clearly marked for this department, it greatly aids the handling of the mail. Will managers please note the fact. This is the start of the advertisement:

THE SECOND WEEK OF VACATION

BEGINS TODAY. It is the last free week of rest and recreation that the little ones will have for themselves until Easter which is a good four months away. We talked last Saturday about encouraging the children to attend the Colonial where they were perfectly safe, both bodily and morally, now we take up another side of the question: "Why the Colonial is and should be the favorite of the little ones." Now, we say: "Send the children where they are sure to be pleased." If you only knew the care we exercised in booking our attractions you'd be assured of the little people's pleasure and entire satisfaction with us. These two weeks in particular—we have hustled in bookings for subjects which we knew would please the children and the ladies. Watch our programs this week and see for yourself. There is always something or someone to please you on our bills, "Bronco Billy" appears Exclusively in our brands of films. "Mutt and Jeff" appear on no other program but the Licensed, which we use here. The same is good for "Alkali Ike" and for Selig's Kid Players who appeared in "Love Before Ten" and other juvenile successes. Remember that the Kiddies "just love" our entertainments.

This is the introduction to a generous sized two column advertisement dropping about nine inches, all of which carries the same idea of giving the kiddies the best of it on their festal weeks. We do not think that the photoplay theater should cater to children exclusively. The photoplay is something more than a children's entertainment, but in the weeks when school is "out," it does pay to give them some extra attention and shape the bills particularly for them.

All Except.

Tmery M. Downs sends in his Knickerbocker News; Cleveland, for the New Year's issue. Except for the front page the work is excellent, but the printer evidently found a lot of new ornaments in his stocking Christmas and was eager to try them out. As a result the front page is too ornate and the sound and telling greeting is made subordinate to an over fancy border. Don't let the printer spill his whole case into the chase when he sets your advertising. You want some rule work and a couple of small ornaments to set off the type, but the real object of advertising is to get business through what you have to say and when a printer wants to get out a specimen book let him do so at his own expense and not yours.

The greeting is a friendly appeal for criticism; "the honest opinion of those who have made our success possible," and a hint of good things coming. The second page is good enough to lift entire. Here it is:

Perhaps you have been coming to the Knickerbocker ever since we opened our doors nearly two years ago, or perchance you are only just finding us in your quest for diversion. Be that as it may, we are deeply obligated to each and every one of you for your kindness and indulgence in seeking us out and accepting our little programme for an evening's amusement, and perhaps not always fully satisfied that the offering was up to your expectations.

Just as each one of you cherish some well outlined ideal and are industriously aspiring to attain its perfection, just so does the Knickerbocker, perhaps with even more sincerity, aspire to greater things.

We are anxiously looking forward for the time when famous plays and noted works of literature will be filmed in great numbers by all the big manufacturers; and we are planning to do our share in the advancement of this great amusement by careful thought in their production. In short, the Knickerbocker means to lead the way to better things during the ensuing year.

The object in placing this little leaflet before you is prompted by an earnest and sincere desire to dispel any reticence the reader may feel in coming forward with suggestions or criticisms, for fear they may not be received with good grace. We want you to feel that you are personally acquainted with "The Knick"; that its ideals and ambitions are linked with your pleasure; and finally impress each individual with the fact that their personal friendship and interest would be the most valued accomplishment of the New Year.

The third page explains their program scheme. They run one feature Monday to Wednesday inclusive, but change the single reels on Tuesday. Another feature and three singles are used for Thursday and Friday and a multiple and four comedies on Saturday. Sunday they run a two-reel and three ones with an extra comedy at the matinee.

The color scheme is brown on a deep cream. It is decidedly good work.

Wants Some Advise.

C. Boehm, of the Opal Theater, Berkeley, Calif., writes:

I have been a constant reader of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD for the past four years, having operated that length of time. A few months ago I purchased this theater and so far have met with fair success, but I think that business could be a great deal better. Therefore, I am going to ask you to give me a few suggestions which might help to build up the business. The house seats 256, so up to the present time I did not think it would pay me to buy printers' ink and have confined my advertising to posters, taking one six-sheet, one three-sheet, three ones and a set of photographs each day. I am running three reels of Universal Film between two weeks and 35 days, charging five cents admission. Christmas I am going to run five reels and charge ten cents. For this occasion I have had a program printed, a copy of which I enclose. Please let me know through your department if it is O.K. or what is lacking and whether you think it would pay to use a weekly program in a house of my size. I will be grateful to any brother who will let me have samples of his advertising.

We assuredly believe that the right sort of a weekly program would yield a return on the investment. Posters are all right where they are seen, but a program can be sent where the posters will not reach. More than this, there is nothing so well planned to make regulars of the occasional patrons as the use of a weekly program, but there is printing and printing and we do not like the appearance of the two programs sent. To sum it up in a work they look "dinky" which is interpreted cheap and mean. The chief fault seems to lie with the printer, though Mr. Boehm is partly to blame because he has turned in more copy than the front page can carry effectively and the printer has done the rest with a poor job of composition. We think that Mr. Boehm selected his printer because he was cheap, but he did not save the dollar or two that represents the difference between the actual cost and what a good shop would have charged. The page is crowded, and so the first glance repels. It is a small sheet, four and a half by six, and there is a lot of copy to set, but even this is no excuse for the commonplace faces used. A better choice of type would have prevented the crowded appearance.

Type to Large.

To explain to Mr. Boehm, he will note that below the name and address of the house he has the matinee and night announcement. These are in a twelve point type and read:

Matinees 2 p. m. daily.
Evenings 7 p. m.

In each case the P. M. is in lower instead of upper case as it should be in a display line. A neat six or eight point would have carried all this in one line. In the same way the address could have been set in a smaller type and this would have gained space as well as adding to the balanced effect of the page. Then "Special Christmas Program" could have been set in three large lines, the "special" starting well toward the left hand of the page, the "Christmas" in the middle and the "Program" running to the right. This was the important announcement, and should have been given a larger and at the same time more ornamental type. Severely plain faces have their uses, but one of these uses is not for ornamental display on a program.

The next important announcement is the five reel show and this is told:

5 BIG REELS 5
of interesting and highly entertaining photoplays

Very probably the reader would know what reels are and could get the idea from the announcement, but "Five big subjects" would have read more interestingly. "Filet of sole" sounds a lot better than "fried flounder," though they are the same and by the same logic "Five splendid plays" sounds more appealing than "5 big reels."

Of course good printing costs money and even an added dollar sometimes means a lot to a house with limited seating capacity, but on the same argument, if it means much, it does not pay to waste three dollars on printing that will not bring three dollars in return when five dollars would buy a job that would make ten dollars of immediate business and leave the after effect as added gain.

Do Well or Do Nothing.

A weekly program will pay, but a weekly program well printed on a vest pocket card will be a better investment than an eight-page job set by the printer's devil when the boss' back is turned. Go to some office large enough to afford a wide variety of type faces, pick out something neat and attractive and get something that looks like a big house. We are under the impression that Berkeley is a residential suburb of San Francisco, in which case the local house will have to stand comparison with the finer places across the bay and the program that might do well enough in a town of a thousand will not be good enough for Berkeley. The printing should suggest refinement and good taste, conveying the suggestion that it is a reflection of the performance itself. Then it will be possible to coax in the man who has never come before and his ten cents is more important than the dime of the usual nickel patron, for he is a possible regular, if the performance is of the right quality.

For that matter we know of many houses that would draw more ten-cent patrons than at half the price and so get more than twice the return for precisely the same film offering. And some of these theaters are located in the very hotbed of the "nickel shows," and it is because of that fact that they could do better at the higher rate. The man who told us a couple of years ago that he would go to the photoplay theaters when they raised the price to a quarter is doing it right now. He did not want to mix with the five-cent patrons, but he does not mind the quarter crowd. But the quarter crowd could not be coaxed with five-cent printing, and this is another point to be borne in mind.

Synopses.

But it is not alone a question of typesetting. The text must be prepared with care. One of these programs tells the story of Bloodhounds of the North. It sticks to facts, but it does not tell them interestingly. It says, for example, that "the police track the fugitive and in the effort to arrest him he is killed and the daughter marries one of the police." The facts could have been more interestingly presented and the two statements, broken into paragraphs, would not have sounded so crudely. As a matter of fact the synopsis does not state that the girl marries the policeman but that she has learned to love him, and the incidents not told in this brief show that this love is justified. That the girl should marry one of her father's slayers does not argue a pretty story. Given the full facts it is seen that there are policemen and policemen in the plot.

It is not an easy matter to condense an already condensed story, but unless the condensation can be attractively done, it is better not to try and cut it down. Mr. Boehm has done well for a first attempt, but we think that these suggestions will lead to better work in future.

As to general schemes, we would refer him to the back numbers. It is only recently that we mentioned a number of business getters.

White Space.

S. Schultz, who conducts several houses in the vicinity of Limestone, Maine, sends in a handbill and wants to know if we think there should be more reading matter. The bill advertises one vaudeville act and adds that "The pictures will be of the very best. Four new ones shown each night."

Since we are asked, we do not think that there should be more reading, but we do think that the titles of those four "very best" pictures would be a much more potent "drag" than the name of some obscure vaudeville trio.

We like white space and believe that many times white space is more valuable than type, but we also believe in telling something about a program and only a casual reference to four-fifths of the entertainment is bad business.

The idea of issuing a handbill is to tell the people what you have. Tell them all you have and tell it convincingly and attractively. Get the name of your house where it shows to the best advantage. In the present bill the word "vaudeville" crosses the page top and bottom in about a 48-point letter and the Dreamland, the title of the house, is run down each side, Chinese fashion. It is hardly probable that this makes much difference in so small a town, but it is not the best practise, for the up and down stuff is not easy to read and should be avoided wherever possible. In this case, the name of the house, being more important than the vaudeville, should have crossed top and bottom and Vaudeville down the sides if something had to be run that way. A better arrangement would have been the name of the house, the date, the name of the half-week vaudeville act and the three lists of pictures. If the titles could not be procured in time it would have been possible to have originated a snappier line than the "very best." It is hard to keep thinking up new copy, but something better than this should have been used or it would not pay to print it.

And on the other hand, if you brag too hard you never will be believed. The Lyric Theater, Binghamton, N. Y., advertises a release with "20,000 men, 500 cannon and 6,000 horses." We would like to believe all that, but we cannot, and we think that those who see the reels will feel a distinct disappointment in a subject that would please if more moderately boomed. A little exaggeration is permissible, but too much will prove a boomerang.

The Lyric program is well displayed and uses a distinctly good idea in featuring. The two reel subject runs across page and the title is set in capitals while the single reels get half the width and the titles are set in upper and lower case. A slightly larger type, perhaps six paints, higher, for the features, would be better yet, but the arrangement is orderly and desirable.

A Kiddie's Matinee.

George A. Bleich, of the Empress, Owensboro, Kentucky, gave a matinee to the children on Christmas day and he gave it the real Christmas spirit. One part reads:

> If you see this ad make it a point to tell the children, especially those that a nickel looks big to.
> No "strings" to this. The doors will be wide open for all, and for the poor most of all.

That's the sort of thing that counts. And building up on that he had "The Price of Human Lives" and above the advertisement of the film was a special card that read:

> TO THE MEMBERS OF THE LOCAL RED CROSS SOCIETY:
> "The Price of Human Lives." the latest Edison film produced under the auspices of your Society, is at the Empress, Tuesday, this week, and I take pleasure in inviting you as my guests to witness the picture. No cards or formality—Just say Red Cross Society to the doorman.
> GEO. A. BLEICH.

That is advertising that advertises. Here was a chance to get such of the Red Cross people as were not regular patrons, and to make certain that he got them he invited them to be his guests.

A Creed.

We always welcome the Academian because we know that the Selma publication will make good reading. The latest to hand starts the second volume and give a retrospect and forecast, parts of which might be slightly changed to form the Exhibitor's Creed. Here is a part of it:

> During 1913 we have endeavored to make our appeal to what might be called "the better class" of people in that they are the people in whom there is most appreciation of the artistic and least desire for the sensational or lurid. In everything we have done, we have tried to keep within the bounds of good taste; every appeal we have made we have tried to make to the better nature of people. Whether we have succeeded or failed in that is a thing for you to decide, we could do no more than try.
> But more than that, far, far more we think, we have confined ourselves to the humble truth in our advertisements, and have tried to keep absolute faith with you in all that we have done. The one man we envy is a manager in a small town in Tennessee who says: "When I tell the people here a thing is good, they believe it, and come."

When you can say things like that and not make people laugh, it's a sign that you're headed right.

Prompt Reply.

Lately we expressed a desire to know something more of the Exhibitors' Official Motion Picture Story Magazine and Weekly Program, and immediately they dropped us a line and back number programs and tell us all about the scheme, which is pretty much what we though it would be. They are an offshoot of the Exhibitors' Publishing Company, Pittsburgh, and they have followed a scheme that this department has always advocated, the wholesale production of printed matter. They write that they are in shape to handle a half million copies weekly. The colored cover is one straight run, which reduces the cost of color printing almost to the straight run for a single house in one color. The type for the release is gotten up and the same type is used for all programs in which a release appears, the cost being divided by the number of programs using it instead of merely by one. The same applies to the miscellaneous matter, the single composition covering all of the publications, there being about a hundred subscribers at present, according to the company's figures. They state that the cost to the manager is so low that by hustling some local advertising for the back page it costs him practically nothing at all. If the proposition is as good as that we think we would rather have the page for the house. We think the company could build up on the scheme and by selling some national advertising be enabled to get out a twelve or sixteen-page issue that could be put out at the same price to the manager.

It is a step in the right direction and we are glad to see it coming. We think the weekly program attractively put is the best advertising any house can have and this proposition enables even the smallest house to have a colored cover with a portrait of some player on the front. We are not lost in admiration of the job they made of John Bunny with his golden hair hanging down his back, as we have before remarked, but the other samples are better in workmanship and so far comparison shows a steady improvement. We'll forgive the company its lengthy name for the sake of the good it is doing. Publishers in cities like Chicago, Denver, St. Louis, New Orleans and others of like importance would do well to look into this scheme.

Programs Wanted.

L. F. Heiberger, of the Broad Theater, Bethlehem, Pa., is thinking of getting out a weekly program and asks that other managers be good enough to send him samples. He asks that we send him any spares that we may have, but we have explained repeatedly in this department that our office room does not permit us to keep this matter on file. Since Mr. Heiberger is in Pennsylvania, we would suggest that he get in touch with the Exhibitor's Supply Company, Pittsburgh.

THE PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Mrs. Parsons Says.

EVIDENTLY Mrs. Louella Parsons is getting tired of being nice to people who prove themselves unworthy. Here is a letter from her:

> Will you kindly announce through the columns of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD that the Essanay Film Mfg. Co. will buy very few scripts the coming year. We have a staff of writers who will supply most of our needs. Of course, we will be glad to consider scenarios written by experienced writers and those from whom we have already purchased scripts, also all good comedies. But aside from this we are not in the market for scenarios. I might add at the present time there is a scarcity of good slap-stick comedies.

That's all Mrs. Parsons says, but reading between the lines we get something like this:

> I'm getting tired of helping people who do not appreciate it. As you probably know, I've done a lot in the last year to help the young author along. I've realized that we need more authors and I've tried to do my share toward developing the promising, but the more I do the more they seem to demand and the more heavily they lean on me. And just because it has been said that I am helpful. I've been made the goat by a lot of writers who simply shoot all they grind out—and they write a lot—into the Essanay studio and expect me to run a free correspondence school for their personal benefit. I'm getting tired of it and so please tell them nicely that I want a professional grade of work.

That is not what Mrs. Parsons said, but we'll bet an alligator against a hole from a stale doughnut that this is about what she would like to say were she less polite and less diplomatic. We happen to know that she has spent a lot of her own time helping the beginner with suggestion and encouragement and we can guess that she, like other editors, finds that it doesn't pay. Two or three other studios are going to shut down on the general market soon if the pressure continues. Hold back all but the best and help along the open market.

Why We're Baldheaded.

There used to be a time when a man who was good for nothing else studied for the ministry. Now he—and his sister—turns to photoplay writing. If he wanted to be a stenographer, he would study shorthand, and some preliminary work with a machine would preface his debut as a typewriter, but he has seen dozens of advertisements that tell him he does not have to be experienced to write photoplays—so he writes plays in much the same spirit as the writer of this letter:

> No doubt you receive a few letters like this one and they are pushed aside before you finish reading them. But please read this through and give it your special attention or give me the information I so much desire. I have written a Photoplay about a "three reel drama" that I am sure will make a hit and am so anxious to get before the public I am a lover of the movies and have been several weeks studying this out. If I have written to the wrong one about this will you please direct me to the right one. and please write me by return mail it will be more than appreciated.

> Thank you.

Here is a woman who doesn't even know how to use commas or periods, who does not capitalize properly and who has no other claim to authorship than that she is a lover of the "movies" and has studied "several weeks," yet, first offense, she writes a three-reel play and wants us to tell her "by return mail" where to sell it. She isn't willing to wait our convenience. she doesn't argue that perhaps we may be busy doing things that help pay for meat and rent. Right away we must sit down to tell her where to sell this play she is sure will make a hit.

Why should we?

We spend eight to twelve hours a week giving free advice to those who seem to be deserving of it. We do not mean writing stuff for this department or as paid criticism, but personal letters and interviews that yield absolutely nothing but thanks in return, but since this is what we give, we want to give it where we believe that it will do some good and we do not think that encouraging people who write three-reel plays with absolutely no previous experience will do any good. We are willing to help the deserving after they have proved themselves deserving; we are willing to help anyone a little, but we will be gosh darned if we'll answer with a three-page letter a request for full information "by return mail." If you want to ask advice, ask and be welcome, but for the love of Mike please be willing to wait half a day or a day until we get a chance to wiggle the machine without neglecting more pressing matters. We know you don't mean it precisely that way, but in your letter show that you realize that you are asking a favor instead of granting one, and we'll be a lot more willing to help.

Following Style.

Frequently we have given the excellent advice to read the Stories of the Films in this paper each week and keep in touch with the needs and likes of the producing companies, but sometimes this advice seems to be taken almost too literally. The other day we saw a script that in a general way was very like our own Zeb, Zack and the Zulus, produced by the Lubin Company. We do not believe that the writer sought to copy our play nor that she even saw it, but we use it simply to point the moral.

In Zeb two missionaries went to Africa and were put in the fattening pen by the cannibal king. They started to sing rag time and while the Zulus practised the dance they went away from there. Surely, it might be argued, if a thing had been done it could be done again, and it could, but there is a difference in the preparation. The script we wrote was done after we had gone over the ground with the director. We took the twenty-mile run from Jacksonville to Pablo Beach and then down the beach, cutting inland here and there to get an idea of the country that was to be used for the jungle stuff. We noted that there were no boats at the beach, which is unprotected from the high surf, no inlets of consequence and no very thick undergrowth. When we wrote the story we called only for what we could get and not for what we could not get. The ship scenes were done abroad a boat moored to the dock and the landing scenes were made in the river and not on the ocean beach. Most important of all, we knew that such a script was wanted and would be purchased.

The other script was not written for any company nor for any particular part of the country. It called for a yacht at dock and at sea, several small boats and a lot of other costly adjuncts.

When you see some special story or series of this sort, do not write one like it. Do not call for yachts and airships and all that sort of thing unless some company has asked you to fit some special need, when they will tell you precisely what they want, and by then you will be so far ahead you will not need this advice. Do not write some story that must be made in the Bay of Fundy unless you know of some company that will work there. Write a story that can be made almost anywhere and if it is a good story you can sell it almost anywhere. Leave the special work for the special men and do only the generally available stuff.

Generally a special run of stuff is not realeased until the series is all done and in the studio. The first of those Zulu stories, for example, was released several weeks after the company making them had left Jacksonville and was established for the summer at Atlantic City, where the darkies were all busy waiting on table in the hotels and getting so much in tips they could not be coaxed to pose for pictures.

Can't Understand It.

J. H. Ritchie, of Oklahoma, in sending in some school stuff, writes:

> As to writing, I have been writing voluminously the past year—practicing really. Most of my efforts go into the waste basket. Occasionally I send a "best effort" to some company. The criticism upon its return is most always a help to me. The rejection slip has no terrors for me; I get the practice anyway, and it is profitable in other ways.
> I find it one of the best schools in the world, and I shall continue to write photoplays even though they are most always rejected. I am a very regular patron of the moving picture theaters, four of which are in this town of 15,000. This helps me some, as I keep in touch with the trend of releases of the various companies.
> As to my experiences, they have been varied. I have written several comedies that apparently—to me at least—were in line with what I would see on the screen, but they would invariably have one reason for rejection—too slight a plot. Yet I would see on the screen night after night comedies that were nothing but a succession of funny incidents. One editor said my comedy was all right, except it was only a succession of funny incidents. Others said there was a total lack of plot, while one said the theme was too slight. I always have prompt returns, sometimes so prompt I doubt if the story was ever read.

That "plot too slight" is something that no man can tell about. Last fall we sent a comedy to a company and were told that the action was very funny, but that it had no plot. We put in a plot and sent it back and they sent it back and said it was not funny, presumably because there was a plot.

The trick is to get just enough of a plot to serve as an excuse and not enough to clog the action. Just what that is it's hard to tell. It is one of the things that must be sensed. Merely humorous action is not sufficient. There must be some peg of plot to hang the action on, some real and well-defined plot, but it should not be so much of a plot that it prevents the development of the action nor so complicated as to call for an excess of leader.

Technical Terms.

Probably you've heard of the man who wears a yachting cap and never did better than a ferry boat ride, but how about the man who uses all the technical terms to show he knows all about writing plays, yet whose work clearly betrays his inexperience.

Ever since the Van Loan stories of photoplay studios have been running in the Saturday Evening Post the authors have been using "establish" and "register" to show that they are familiar with the work and some of them do not know yet just what "establish" means. They use the terms and the very fact that they do employ the terms shows that they do not know.

The other day a script came in with fifteen or twenty "flash" scenes. The writer had seen "flash" used in a script and he liked the word. He did not know that a flash was just that, a fleeting glimpse, a few feet only of some break scene. He took flash in the sense that a person moved hurriedly from one place to another and he had flashes of action that would run from fifteen to thirty seconds. If he had written before every scene, "I am a beginner!" he could not have revealed himself more clearly.

Just as a matter of fact, the practised writer does not make an extensive use of the slang of the studio. He says "flash" if he wants to or he might say "a few feet of" a certain action. He may say that Jack "establishes" himself in the background, or he may say that "Jack appears in the background." He uses whichever comes to him.

It is the same way with enter and exit. Recently we saw a scene that read that "the doctor's face enters at the window." Something happened to scare the owner of the face and so—"face exits" presumably to rejoin the rest of the head.

The value of a script lies not so much in its rigid adherence to the jargon of the studio as in its clearness of expression and brevity of phrase. In a stage play "Jack exits" is the simplest direction to get Jack off the stage and so it is generally used, but the rigid and undeviating use of the word exit in a photoplay does not indicate good photoplay form, but more generally serves only to display the general ignorance of the novice. The practised writer uses exit only when it is handier than some other word. The veteran may write "Jack enters from house, goes up street." The novice who says "Jack enters from house. Jack exits up street" may be correct, but awkward. Write naturally without regard to studio slang and you'll be in better form.

The American Studios at Santa Barbara.

By Marc Edmund Jones.

The American Film Manufacturing Co. is located at Santa Barbara, about one hundred miles up the coast from Los Angeles. The city is located in a pocket in the hills, being surrounded on three sides by mountains of various heights which run to the ocean's edge both north and south of the city.

The Southern Pacific railroad hugs the edge of these hills at these points and during the rainy season there are times when it will be washed out completely, and the city will be cut off from the outside world. There is one dock, Stearn's Wharf, and from here a steamship service is maintained to Los Angeles and San Francisco throughout the year.

Santa Barbara is a well-known winter resort, and Montecito, a suburb, contains many beautiful homes. The Gillespie estate, a show spot of Southern California, was used for the settings in "In the days of Trajan." The resort and town people show an unusual willingness to co-operate with the American company, and the opportunity for beautiful settings are inexhaustible. The city itself is not cramped in its location, and so the main street—State Street—has few buildings over two stories in height. The buildings are modern, however, and there is a modern street car system, so that few things ordinarily called for in a scenario are impracticable for the American producers. Stearn's Wharf has been used a number of times. The steamboats only make a way stop at Santa Barbara, however, and for that reason sea stories are apt to be undesirable. Stories with a large cast cannot be handled as well is in Los Angeles, as the available extra people are not as experienced as those that can be procured in the larger city. There is little water in the vicinity of Santa Barbara, except in the rainy season, and the water set in "Destinies Fulfilled" necessitated a trip to a spot considerably distant. At this writing retrospect stories have been overworked by producers, and, as a general thing, in watching American films, it is well to bear in mind that the type of story seen on the screen (considering the story, and not the character of the acting, setting, and production) is NOT the type of story wanted, as the American policy is toward variety, and the producers will go to considerable trouble with anything new or novel. For that reason they will frequently buy ideas.

The studio is located in the city, and consists of permanent brick and mission buildings, with a glass studio. The scenario department is in Santa Barbara, and scripts are addressed to the American company at Santa Barbara, without street address. The editor is merely a reader, and the scripts are passed upon by the directors individually, and, if wanted by them, held for consideration by S. S. Hutchinson, the president of the company. Mr. Hutchinson personally passes upon every story before it can be bought or produced, and this oftentimes leads to delay, as he also personally looks after the interests of the Mutual exchanges on the Pacific coast, and only spends a part of his time in Santa Barbara.

Lorimer Johnston, producer of company No. 1, features Vivian Rich, Sidney Ayres, Jack Richardson, Louise Lester, and Harry von Meter, and likes problem and psychological plays with a strong punch. Thomas Ricketts and company No. 2 works Winnifred Greenwood and Ed. Coxen in sentimental, heart-interest stories. Johnston and Ricketts alternate on Westerns, and Johnston produces an occasional comedy. In a new company to release under the "Beauty" brand, Harry Pollard will produce himself with his wife, Margarita Fischer, in simple, strong heart-interest stories of real life, and wants stories featuring Miss Fischer, with an occasional one to feature little Kathie Fischer, five years old and a clever little actress.

"It Was a Dream."

Don't write dream stuff. It's the most certain indication that your story is too wild and too improbable to stand the test of logic, and instead of tearing it up you say "It was a dream," as though that would excuse anything.

Most editors regard dream stuff as being the confession of the author that he has written something that he should not have done, and pass it over on general principles.

But there is a mechanical reason as well. Most of the dream stuff must be faded from one scene to the next to preserve the suggestion of a vision, and this costs extra money that seldom gives extra effect.

We Got Two Ladies Mixed.

Mrs. Breuil tells us we are worse than Pinafore's Little Buttercup for mixing people up. We said that Miss Smith was reading for the North American and Miss McCall doing the leaders. Quite the reverse. Miss Smith does the leaders and Miss McCall is helping on the editorial end.

Your Good Friends.

"Several of my friends, one of them the manager of a moving picture house here, have told me that my scripts are better than usual."

That's the way a recent letter runs along, so we asked the writer what reason she had to suppose that her friends, even the manager of the photoplay theater, knew anything at all about scripts, let alone the comparative value of hers and others. She believed that they must know because they told her that the stuff was good. If they had said it was poor she would have told herself that they were incompetent critics, that they were jealous, or something of that sort, but so long as they said "good" she knew that they must be right.

There is not one photoplay manager in a thousand who can visualize the action of a written script. No outsider can tell a good script from a poor one, so the author goes on writing, knowing her work to be good, because her friends tell her so, and she makes no progress because she will not realize that repeated rejections are due to her poor work and not to the inability of the editors to tell a good script when they see one.

Your friends are your worst enemies if they try to criticise your stuff unless they are fully competent to render an expert opinion with a full knowledge of studio wants and methods.

Inquiries

NOTE—No inquiries can be replied to by mail. Look for your answers here. No question can be replied to that necessitates the handling of the manuscript. Always give your name and address. It will not be published. A list of addresses, to which photoplays should be sent, will be supplied on receipt of a STAMPED AND SELF ADDRESSED ENVELOPE. The request should be made to the paper direct and not to this department, nor to the Answers Man.

R. J. H.—We are always glad to reply to questions, but please ask about things of general interest and lay off that "Yukon Kid," signature. Have no data on Advance wants. Do not know that they want anything. "No vacancy at present, but leave your name and address," is a polite way of saying "no" as a rule. They put your application on file and there it stays.

G. W. B.—Most of the editors, and a majority of the producers, want scripts single spaced and with the scenes numbered at the side. You write a good story and the matter of spacing will not count.

M. H. E.—"An enthusiastic reader," should know the answers to most of the questions you propound. Leader and sub-title are synonymous. Insert is not a leader, but any matter, not a leader, that must be inserted in the film, a letter, photograph or what not. The use of a dash in place of punctuation is convenient, but optional. Submit to Eastern or Western Universal, according to whether you wish to reach the companies working in Los Angeles or New York. There are editors at both ends of the line. The chief demand in a script is an original idea, next, a sound development of this plot. This paper is issued on Saturday, and dated seven days ahead.

RUBENA.—Even with you, Rubena, we refuse to discuss broken noses or harelips in print. Miss Joyce is with the Jacksonville section of Kalem. Sure we got some Christmas presents.

E. A. C.—The submission of film subjects to the National Board of Censorship is purely a voluntary action on the part of the manufacturer. Most regular releases are submitted. The Board does not pass on special features.

T. S.—Try Selig. It's not an easy market, but about the only one for what you have.

A. B. M.—Thanks, but we use no poetry.

E. L. C.—Eclair and other addresses for the asking. See head of department. Your letter has been taken over into the Photoplaywright. Look for it in a few weeks.

E. T. L.—You can "get some dandy ideas out of the magazines," and you can get some dandy diamond rings out of a jewelry store when the shopkeeper is not looking, but in either case you would be a thief if you take the property of someone else. A single copyright line, generally on the contents page, covers all the contents of a magazine, and the plea that you did not see it will not avail you in court. If you cannot invent stories, don't try to pretend you are an author.

B. B.—Eastern Universal is slow. We've had scripts in since Dec. 3, and no action yet. We are not worried yet.

LOIS.—The Biograph Identifier does not know Lucy Ann in "The Capturing of David Dunne." She seems to have been a transient. Allan Hale was David. William Stowell was Wallace, in "Through Another Man's Eyes." Lubin now has no set companies, the players being cast to fit the story instead of the story being recast to fit some particular company. It makes for better production. Thanks for your good wishes.

D. J. P.—It is proper to send more than one script in one cover if there is a return envelope for each of the scripts so sent, but it is not a good plan to send many at a time to any one company. It gives the impression that you are trying to unload some back numbers or that you produce too quickly to be able to do good work.

ROSE.—Harold Lockwood played opposite Miss Williams in "The Young Mrs. Eames. No addresses in this department. Send to Kalem. Not so old we have to be carried around—yet.

R. J. H.—A printed rejection slip does not require a signature. The Editor is not required to assign a reason for rejection. Most companies will take three and four reel stories, the companies named require an exceptionally good grade of script to beat their regular writers. The American recently advertised for scripts to their Chicago office.

MISS M. I. G.—There is a market for perfectly developed photoplays of marked originality, but we are afraid that you cannot qualify. Those who have the "grandest ideas" seldom have salable ones. Your letter does not suggest any of the qualifications that go to make a successful script writer. If you do take up the work, "Technique" will set you straight, but we would advise you not to try. Sorry we can't be optimistic. If you want to be lied to, try the correspondence schools.

17 Madison Avenue - New York City

Projection Department

Conducted by F. H. RICHARDSON

Operators' Union Directory, I. A. T. S. E.

NOTICE—Each union is entitled to have its roster of officers, meeting nights, etc., listed here once per year, free of cost. Preserve this list, as it will not be republished. The mail address of the secretary should be included, and the address of regular meeting-place, if any.

Local Union No. 307, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

Louis Krause, president; John Harris, vice-president; W. G. Murray, recording secretary; W. J. Symns, financial secretary; A. Oliver, sergeant-at-arms; George Gorman, business manager. Meets in Labor Union Temple.

Important Notice.

It is impossible to reply to letters through the department in less than two weeks and sometimes three. In order to give prompt service those sending 4 cents in stamps to cover the cost of same will receive a carbon copy of the department reply by mail. Those desiring the full list of the questions, now running in the department, may obtain same by remitting 25 cents.

Question No. 17.

Would you or would you not ground the frame of your motor, your generator or your motor-generator? Explain, in detail, reasons for your answer. What is a "ground" as applied to an armature or a field coil and what is the effect of each? Give method which may be applied by the average operator for testing for armature and field coil grounds. If you are using 35 amperes d. c., the current being 110 volt, how many additional h. p. must the engine exert at the power plant, or your own engine if an isolated plant, when you are using your arc and how much of this power is used in actual production of light at the arc? Where does the rest go? What difference would it make if the supply were a. c.? What difference would it make if the current were 70 volt? If it were 220 volt?

No Answer.

There is no answer this week because through an oversight questions No. 10 and 11 were the same. Let us hope this won't happen again. If it does I will kick myself in the forehead real hard.

The Past, Present and Future.

It is now fitting and proper that just as the grizzled old year sinks into the grave of the past, and the new born babe frisks into the scene, we should pause for a moment and look back over the record of the twelve months gone, consider the present, and perhaps take a little peep into the future.

Never, I think, in the history of the human race has such a large number of craftsmen of one kind been created in so short a time. The boy is still in school who was yet unborn when the moving picture came into existence as a form of amusement. There were then no moving picture operators; there were no moving picture theaters; yet today we have, in the United States and Canada alone, as many as 25,000 and perhaps 30,000 men who claim the title "Moving Picture Operator."

The editor of this department has many times spoken of the crude work displayed on thousands of screens in this country. He has done this with a distinct end in view, and that end was to arouse the operator from his lethargy of inaction, to convince him that his work was and is not perfect—even very imperfect—and, if possible, to shock him into an effort to improve it.

During the past twelve months there has been very noticeable improvement in projection. Audiences are becoming more and more critical; managers are slowly but surely learning that the editor of the Projection Department is not a mere crank after all, and that there really is a whole lot, from the box office point of view, in perfect projection of the pictures.

Screens have been greatly improved; machine manufacturers have kept pace with the general advance; motor generator sets have been perfected; transformers have to some extent been improved; carbon manufacturers have also raised the excellence of their product to some extent, and the operator himself is not being left behind in the procession of events. Today the average theater shows one hundred per cent. better lighted screens than it did two years ago, and very much better lighted ones than it did one year ago. By careful study on the part of the machine manufacturer and the operator the flicker has been largely reduced, and on many screens practically entirely eliminated.

When this department was started four years ago the operator was not recognized at all by anyone. He was regarded almost as a joke. The editor well remembers one New York manager, who is today paying $30.00 a week for his operator, and who is now something of a crank on projection, saying: "Why, $10.00 a week is plenty for any operator. Any fool can run a projection machine."

The operator of today has a standing; the importance of his work is very generally recognized. He is no longer despised and derided, but as a rule both he and his work are respected. Slowly but surely the profession of operating is being raised to a higher level, and it naturally follows that the men themselves are gradually being themselves raised to a higher plane. This process invariably follows in the train of increased knowledge coupled with increased respect and responsibility.

The future is something we may not with certainty look into, but I believe that the coming twelve months will show an advance equal with that of the year just gone, and that in a comparatively short time the profession or trade of moving picture operating will take its place right alongside of other highly respected and dignified occupations, such as that, for instance, of the locomotive engineer, and why not? Undoubtedly and unquestionably the moving picture operator of the future is going to have to serve an apprenticeship, and it won't be any six-month apprenticeship either. I hope and expect to see the time, before many years, when from one to two years' apprenticeship will be required before a man will be placed in charge of an operating room. Perfection in projection is still in the future, but, with the present inclination to study and the present avenues of knowledge, there is no reason why practical perfection cannot be attained within a comparatively short period of time.

An Error.

Mr. R. C. Wilson, Winnipeg, Canada, calls attention to a very obvious error in Answer No. 1, page 863, November 22d issue. The first sentence at the top of the second column reads:

> By cutting in resistance you decrease the number of lines of force, thus reducing the speed of the armature, because it must run faster in order to develop, etc.

It is plain to be seen that "reduce" should read "increase." Many thanks to Brother Wilson, and, as I have said, the error is quite obvious.

???????

From a prominent Canadian city comes the following. I do not name the city, because a single letter is not conclusive evidence of the genuineness of the complaint. However, if it does exist, those in the city in question will no doubt recognize their own faults:

> I am not an operator, but I am nevertheless a reader of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD, and wish to make a few remarks concerning some of the operators in our city. This is prompted by your recent remarks concerning New York operators. The principal offender I have in mind is the one at the Maple Leaf Theater. Almost any night you will find the film jumping from the sprocket and there are many shadows on the screen; but worst of all is the speed, which I understand is supposed to be fifteen minutes per 1,000 feet (you have another understand coming, neighbor. It may be anything from 14 to 20, according to the subject.—Ed.). Well, when this operator is not in a hurry he sometimes spends as much as five whole minutes on one reel, which I think you will agree is a shameful waste of time; and let me also remark that the "manager" stands there and watches the performance without saying a word. The only thing I can say in favor of this theater is, they always have the films before any other house in the city. If you ever happen to be in this neck of the woods just drop into the Maple Leaf, located at the busiest corner in the city, and witness the performance for yourself.

If I positively knew that the conditions were correctly described I would not hesitate at all about naming the city. No wonder the film "jumps off the sprocket." The speed, as given, is of course exaggerated, but I presume it is plenty fast enough. Doubtless this would-be manager and imitation operator are trying to emulate the performance of some of our shoot-em-through East Side artists here in New York. Such work is an outrage on the business, on the public which pays its money, on the film exchange which rents the films, and on the manufacturer whose machine is subjected to that kind of abuse. The business would be better off without exhibitors of this particular brand—always assuming that the information contained in the letter is correct.

An Invitation.

W. E. Brown, Secretary, Local Union No. 291, Grand Rapids, Mich., writes:

> Enclosed find $2.50 for a copy of the Handbook for our Local Union. We are going to have a banquet in honor of outgoing officers of the local, and extend you a cordial invitation to attend.

It would indeed be a pleasure to partake of the hospitality of Local Union No. 291, but that, of course, is out of the question. Many thanks, nevertheless, for your kind invitation. As to the Handbook, I would suggest that, while it is all right to buy a copy for the local, still the various members ought to own a copy and have it available at all times. Surely it is at least worth its price to any operator. Now, do not misunderstand me, boys, I am not saying this simply to sell more books, but I firmly believe it is very much to your individual interest to do so.

Philadelphia.

A letter was received from Walter G. Murray, secretary of Local Union No. 307, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, which reads, in part, as follows:

> Enclosed you will find tickets to our concert and smoker, to be held December 28th, 8 P. M., and you are hereby sentenced to one reel and real good time on that day and date. Now you must come, and no excuse will be accepted.

In response to this invitation the writer journeyed to the City of Brotherly Scraps, where he was met at the depot at 10 A. M. by Brother Louis Krouse, president, W. G. Murray, recording secretary, and W. J. Syms, financial secretary of M. P. M. O. Local Union No. 307, who, up till 2 P. M., worked a touring car overtime, showing the editor the historic city of Philadelphia, including the League Island Navy Yard. We also visited the home of friend Murray, met his charming family, were introduced to a real Philadelphia chicken—frying merrily in the family skillet—and wound up with a dinner at Green's restaurant, the swell "eats" of Philadelphia. After 2 o'clock we attended the meeting of Local Union No. 307 and were surprised at the turn-out. The organization has almost four hundred members, and they are a bright, progressive looking bunch of men, as evidenced by the accompanying photograph taken in the hall the evening of the entertainment. In this picture you will notice the editor is an island surrounded by Philadelphia operators. The entertainment was not only a success, but a howling success. The Hall was a large one and it was full, but, greatly to the credit of the Philadelphia boys, although there were "eats and drinks" in plenty in the basement below, none of the operators showed the least inclination to emulate the condition of the hall, although the aforesaid eats and drinks were entirely free. The crowd, and it was a crowd too, was orderly in every sense of that term. It was thoroughly good natured, and the entertainment was not of the ordinary "smoker" type, but was clean throughout; it was mighty good too. The only thing I saw the least out of the way was when the operator, in running a set of song slides, inadvertently got the Battle of Gettysburg upside down. This didn't look exactly natural, but accidents will happen in the best regulated families, so I guess we will have to forgive the boy this time. Don't do it again, however, for if one of those cannon happened to drop it would break the sky all to pieces. It might damage some of the stars or even put out the sun, to say nothing of the danger of all those soldiers dropping off into space, or the smoke of battle arising and choking them to death.

In conclusion, let me say that I was hugely and agreeably surprised. We had not heard much of anything from Philadelphia in the department, but I quickly discovered there were a lot of department fans there just the same, and the editor was kept reasonably busy all the afternoon and evening shaking hands with Philadelphia operators, and they were not any limp dish-rag handshakes he met either.

By-the-way, our good friend W. Stephen Bush was to accompany us, but he fell by the wayside. We were to take the train at 8 A. M., but, as it later developed, the only way that could have been done would have been to have moved the bed into a Pennsylvania coach, as Stephen was still far away in the Land of Nod when the train pulled out. He had the good grace, however, to show up in Philadelphia at 8 P. M. Imagine it! He had solemnly sworn, promised, affirmed and declared that he would be our guide in Philadelphia. Fortunately, however, thanks to the Philadelphia brothers, we needed no guide, but if we had, friend Stephen would have proven not only a broken reed but a completely busted one. Nevertheless, immediately upon his arrival it was thoroughly demonstrated that brother Bush has a world of friends in "Philamaklink" whereof he was "onct" a resident. In fact, he proved so popular that by the time of departure I was beginning to feel a beautiful shade of pea green—jealousy breaking out on me.

We left Philadelphia at 12:30, brothers Nathan Fierman and Vernon Alley accompanying us to the depot. Through a misunderstanding we had to wait an hour, and that time was thoroughly enjoyed by both Mr. Bush and myself in conversing with the two above named friends. I mention this incident because both of the boys impressed us as being men of remarkably good sense and of broad, comprehensive understanding.

And now I feel that the coming year will see wonderful things, for on the way home Bush and I talked over matters National, International and Undernational, cussed and discussed everything from President Wilson's policy to the Paris Apaches, and settled all great questions to our thorough and mutual satisfaction. In view of this fact as I before said, we feel affairs in America will run smoothly indeed during the coming year.

An Exceedingly Interesting Experiment.

W. L. Johnston, Toronto, Canada, suggests the following highly interesting experiment.

> To begin with I want to wish you a bright and prosperous New Year, and to tell you that your questions have already done me an enormous amount of good, and they will, I am sure, continue to do so. I don't know all the answers, by a long shot, but have to dig around and grub them out. I would like to suggest that the MOVING PICTURE WORLD devote more space to the things of real benefit to the profession, such as the projection department, photoplaywright and technical articles, giving less space to manufacturers' advance notes, etc. Brother James, of Camden, has a very practical method of writing on the screen. I have found it to be very successful.
> And now I suppose there are others besides myself who spend a goodly portion of their pay every week experimenting. For their benefit here is a stunt which may prove interesting, though not connected directly with projection. Procure an ordinary telephone receiver and connect it across the line, with a 16 or 32 c.p. lamp in series with it. Now get your assistant to speak directly into the lighted arc and you will hear what he says plainly in the receiver anywhere on the line. Suppose your generator is located downstairs, you can build a specially wound receiver and attach it to the circuit downstairs and scare seventeen different varieties of daylight out of your assistant, who is running the machine upstairs, because he will hear the arc itself speak to him plainly. It takes some experimenting to get the correct winding on your receiver. This works on the principle of the Poulsen Singing Arc, used in wireless telephony. The field coils of your heavily wound generator can be made to talk the same way by superimposing one current on another, but, this is not an experiment to be tried by everyone, regardless of whether they understand what they are doing or not. For instance: you must not start superimposing 25 cycle current on d.c. unless you know absolutely what you are doing, else something might happen. Would like to ask you what chance a man like myself, who is non-union, would have of obtaining employment in New York?

Answering your last question first, I would suggest that you get into the organization. There are still a great many non-union operators in New York, and you would have to, as everyone else does, take your own chance. However, if you are doing well where you are let me suggest that the cost of living in New York is very much higher than there, for an equal class of living I mean, and you had better look and think several times before you jump in the direction of Gotham. As to the experiment, I simply refer it to our readers as very interesting, and something which might furnish considerable amusement, but, as you suggest, it should only be attempted by men who understand what they are doing. It is not a stunt to be tried by the novice. As to the space devoted to film comments, it is valuable and necessary to the manager and exhibitor. The paper is, I think, very well balanced as it now is.

Perfected Shipping Pail.

Jesse P. McBride, maker of the Wagner Film Holder, has forwarded one of his improved shipping packages, or pails for inspection. This shipping pail was described and illustrated in the department some time ago, but it has now been improved by the addition of an inside lining of some material, presumably insulating and fire-resisting. The package is in the form of a metal pail made of heavy galvanized iron, with substantial ears to receive the bail. These ears and the bail form an important part of the package. The ears are slotted; the bail is made of very heavy spring steel and in such manner that by inserting one end into one of the ears, turning the bail one-quarter over, springing it open (easily done) and snapping the other end into its slot in the other "ear," the bail is held securely in place, and at the same time automatically locks on the metal cover of the pail. The bail may then be sealed with an ordinary lead and wire seal, like the kind freight cars are sealed with, and the films are thus protected in every way. The device is as light as any equally substantial shipping package could possibly be. It is convenient to handle by reason of its bail, and, taking everything into consideration is, I believe, the acme of perfection in a film shipping package. We wish brother McBride every success. He informs us that the package has been approved by both the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the board of Fire Underwriters.

Group of Philadelphia Operators Taken at the Concert and Smoker Given By Them on the Evening of December 28.

Cheap Supplies.

A certain company, or organization, is just now advertising machine supplies, lenses, etc., at an enormously reduced figure. As a general proposition the projection department is absolutely opposed to this. In the first place, as long as the machine manufacturers keep within the bounds of reason in prices for their machine parts the exhibitor ought, in the judgment of this department, to buy all his machine parts from the manufacturer of the projector he uses; or, in other words, buy parts made by that manufacturer, and steer entirely clear of those made by anyone else. This particular advertiser tries to clinch the matter by saying that money paid for any part not perfectly satisfactory will be promptly refunded. This, as a matter of fact, does not amount to much. Suppose the new part which you put in your projector costs you $1, and that it does not work right and injures your projection. Now, any injury to your projection is an injury to your business and would be difficult to estimate in dollars and cents. However, it is pretty nearly a certainty that any appreciable injury to projection would reduce box office receipts a good many times what the defective part cost. Moreover, you have had all the trouble of installing the part and then taking it out and installing another part, which alone would be worth the price paid to the manufacturer himself for the article. This department is of the opinion that the exhibitor is making a tremendous mistake in seeking to save a few cents on things which have to do with his projection. The exhibitor ought to take the position, and a real exhibitor will take the position, that it is perfection he wants rather than cheapness in machine parts.

Now, let us take the Edison, Powers, Simplex, Standard and the Motiograph machines for example. These various manufacturers have all expended large, and some of them huge, sums of money in perfecting a projector, the success of which will depend upon the perfection of the results that machines place on the screen. Suppose, for instance, John Doe, an exhibitor, in Denver, Colorado, purchases a machine from any one of these machine manufacturers. Presumably that particular transaction is closed with the completion of the sale, but, as a matter of fact, it is just well begun. Let us suppose that after this projector is installed, Henry Doe, another exhibitor who is needing a machine, visits John Doe's theater. He sees a perfectly projected picture and naturally inquires, "What kind of a machine have you?" The chances are he will buy the same projector, on the strength of the excellent work produced by the machine in that theater, especially if he sees other similar machines producing equally good results. Let us suppose, on the other hand, that this projector does not produce a good picture; the picture jumps, or has excessive flicker or vibration. Henry Doe comes in, views the performance, inquires what kind of a machine it is and goes away with the idea in his mind that it will be well to buy some other make of projector—in fact any other than the one whose performance has displeased him.

Let us carry this matter a little further. Suppose this machine did, when first installed, produce perfect results—a beautiful, steady, and in every way excellent picture—but, by and by, the geneva, the cam, the intermittent, or some other vital part became worn. It is absolutely vital to the interest of the maker of that projector, as has been shown, that his machine produce perfect results on the screen, therefore, its makers have a very genuine and large interest in seeing to it that the repair part supplied to take the place of the worn part be a perfect one, or as nearly perfect as human skill can make it. On the other hand, the man, or the company making parts, other than the manufacturer of the projector, has no such interest. It is absolutely nothing to the manufacturer of machine parts whether the Power's projector, or the Simplex projector, or the Edison projector, or the Motiograph projector produces excellent results on the screen, or does not produce excellent results on the screen. They are not interested in any way in the performance of any projector as a whole. They have not spent hundreds of thousands of dollars in building up the reputation of any particular projector. They are, as a matter of fact, only interested in the sale of a single repair part, and they very well know that all too many managers, and all too many operators, also, will not be in position to say whether an imperfection in screen results is due to a fault in the repair part purchased from them or not. And, after all, why should the exhibitor take any chances in buying cheap parts? Suppose he buys, for 50 cents, a part for a Simplex, or one for an Edison which would have cost him $1 from the machine manufacturer: that part would probably wear a year, and possibly a good deal longer. He has "saved" the enormous sum of half a dollar, and, in so doing, has taken at least a certain amount of risk of getting a part that is not as perfect as the part produced by the machine manufacturer.

Again: let us cite the Nicholas Power Company, selecting them because I am better acquainted with their factory than with the others. The Power Company has installed grinders which have a speed of 22,000 revolutions a minute for the grinding of certain parts. This was done, at enormous expense, after years of experimenting, simply to secure the very last word in mechanical accuracy. It would have to be shown to me that any manufacturer of cheap parts, or any other manufacturer, other than the maker of a projecting machine, has installed such machinery as this to produce perfection, and these machines are only one item. The Edison Company has an enormous factory, equipped with every modern facility for producing accurate work, and the Precision Machine Company has machinery that comes as near as anything human can come to spelling accuracy, and I presume the Motiograph factory is similarly equipped, though I have not seen it for several years.

Now, Mr. Exhibitor, you get the benefit of all this enormously costly machinery when you buy a part made by the machine manufacturer, and, conversely, the last word in cheapness in price does not encourage fine mechanical accuracy. That is just plain, common sense.

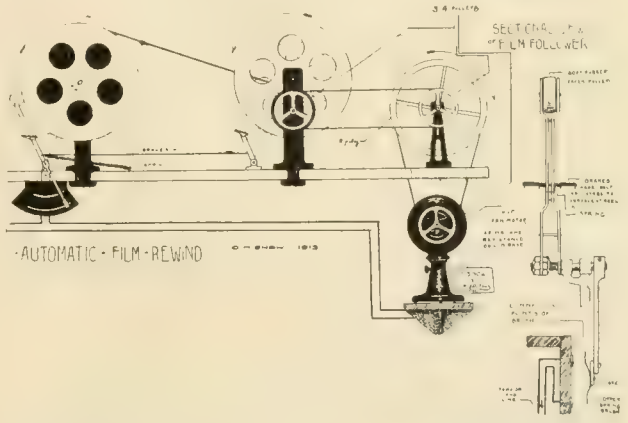
In closing I wish to say emphatically that this is not written with an idea of "knocking" anyone's particular proposition, excepting in so far as a statement of a matter as I see it constitutes a knock. I wish to add, however, that the Edison machine is put out with a guarantee covering a certain extended period of time, but that guarantee is absolutely and entirely abrogated the moment you install any part not made by the Edison Company. The Power Company is now selling machines with the agreement that no parts except those made by the Powers Company be used, and you are likely to get into trouble if you are caught using any other than Power's parts. I am not certain, but I think, the same thing applies to the Simplex and Motiograph, and, if it does not certainly it ought to. The manufacturer's price for parts is, everything considered, not excessive.

So far as the condensing lenses are concerned I am thoroughly convinced that no house could, for any length of time, sell a genuinely high-class condenser for fifty cents, because I am quite certain they won't make one red cent by so doing, and I am not so sure they won't lose money.

An Automatic Rewinder.

C. H. Snow, Middletown, Delaware, forwards an excellent drawing of an automatic rewinder he has invented. He writes:

> It is wholly my idea and has proved very satisfactory in operation. I am not an operator but a pianist in the only theater in Middletown. However, I must say that we have perfect projection. I think there are exceptions to your statement to Mr. Doyle in November 15th issue of the World as we have two Underwriters' Model Edison's, and a better picture you will seldom see. It gives me a pain to see some of the poor projection in Philadelphia (Wow! fireworks from Philadelphia.—Ed.), and they get away with it, too.



> I think I have made the drawing quite plain, and that it needs little explanation, although what I don't know about drawing would fill a book. I used an ordinary 16-inch fan motor and by the use of pulleys and gearing, as shown, the motor carries the load to perfection. All the operator is required to do is to put the reel on and fasten the end of the film to the hub of the empty, pull up the follower against the surface of the film, and "let 'er go." As the film is wound on the empty the speed of the motor gradually decreases, owing to the greater load. When the reel is empty the pulley of the film follower will just pass by the hub, shut off the power and put on the brakes. The surface of the brake is covered with fibre or leather, and the brush on the switch should be insulated by fibre or hard rubber if the shelf on which the rewinder is fastened is of metal. I am a close follower of every line in the projection and music departments, and if this letter escapes the basket I might send in another suggestion in payment of the vast number of hints I have gotten through the MOVING PICTURE WORLD.

Brother Snow, I must give you a "ka-nock." I did not say anything about an up-to-date Edison Underwriter's Model in replying to friend Doyle. I distinctly said an "old style inside shutter Exhibition Model machine." In this connection you must remember that the old style Edison Exhibition machine had an inside shutter of quite a different pattern from the later models. Now, will you stand hitched? As to the rewinder, it is a very clever idea, which looks practical, and I pass it on to the department fans for their consideration. Maybe you don't know much about mechanical drawing, but I wish other drawings sent in possessed even as much as one-third as high a degree of excellence. Glad to look over your other ideas when you get them ready.

A Merry Christmas.

The editor is in receipt of the following from Regina, Saskatchewan, Canada, written by F. R. Whitehead, recording secretary:

> It was moved and seconded that I write you, wishing you a Merry Christmas and a Happy and Prosperous New Year from Local Union No. 295, I. A. T. S. E. We hope that the projection department will be as beneficial to operators the coming year as it has been in the past.

My compliments to Local Union 295. Your expression of friendship is appreciated. I hope and trust that the coming year will prove a prosperous one, not only for Local Union 295, but for every other organization of operators, and let me say that if we all put our shoulders to the wheel and shove, 1914 will be a prosperous year. But if we spend the time in petty bickerings, and waste the opportunities presented to us, then, while 1914 may still be to some extent prosperous, it will not be the success it otherwise would be. My compliments, brother Whitehead, to each and every one of your members.

A Neat Card.

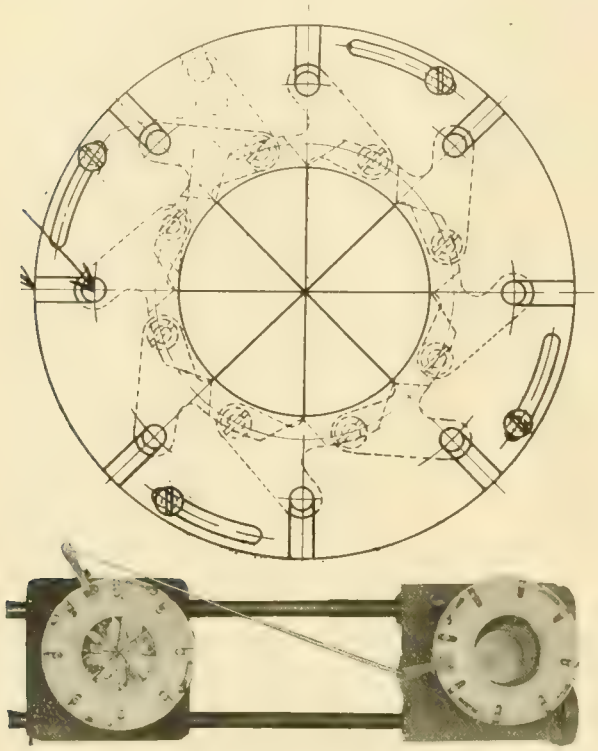
The editor is in receipt of a neatly gotten up card, reading as follows:

> The Moving Picture Operators' Union of Los Angeles, California, I. A. T. S. E., wishes you a Merry Xmas and a very prosperous New Year.

The wording is surrounded by a pretty border of holly in green and red. Presumably they have sent this card out to all their friends, and it is a very nice thing to do.

A New Dissolving Shutter.

Mr. Earle Wooden, of New York City, has presented to the department what looks like the best device yet evolved in the shape of a dissolving shutter. It is no more efficient than the Iris dissolving shutter, but it is strong, rugged, and will, I believe, produce results fully equal to those of any other shutter. Outside of the results, the thing which will appeal to the exhibitor and operator is the simplicity of the device, and the rugged strength of its parts.



It is hardly necessary to describe the shutter in detail, since the illustration shows its operation very plainly. The diamond pointed segments are of steel, 1-16 of an inch thick, and there is little or nothing to get out of order. It is so made that it can be mounted on any stereopticon lens, where it is secured in place by six thumb screws. As the shutter is operated, in closing the diamond point segments by reason of the pins and slots, as shown in the drawing, are tipped inward simultaneously, thus gradually closing the opening in the best possible manner, the closed lens opening by the same process in reverse. We believe that friend Wooden has solved the dissolving shutter problem since his device is not only theoretically correct, but it is a commercial practical device.

Experience and Study.

S. E. Barnes, Wichita, Kan., encloses money order for a set of the questions and contributes the following:

> I have been looking for some good works on electricity suitable for the student, but have not been able to find them. (Neither have I.—Ed.). Am taking an electrical engineer's course in the I. C. S. I know you do not think very favorably of the correspondence course, still I think it is very good if you stay with it. There are times when one feels like giving it up, but if you stick you will have something when you get through. I have been operating for six years, and what little I know I have learned by experience and study. I am greatly indebted to the Projection Department and the Handbook, of which latter I have both editions. We are never too old to learn, and if a person wishes to improve his work there is no better way than by study combined with practical experience. Practical experience is all very well, but one must also have technical knowledge to go with it if one wants to do really high grade work. I am never satisfied with my picture (when the time comes that you are, brother, right then and there you will cease to advance.—Ed.), though I always start in frame and watch my light and speed very closely. We have had some trouble with inspectors with regard to motor drives. Some time ago the state inspector came to Wichita and made us all stop using motors. Now what can be done to get the state of Kansas to allow us to use motors, provided they are in the hands of reliable operators? I think if the state would examine all operators they could issue permits to the men who prove themselves capable of handling motor driven machines.

That is not the point, Brother Barnes. The state could examine a man as to his capability, but that would not prove that the capable man would not start his motor-driven projector going and go over in another part of his operating room to rewind a film, or stick his head out of the operating room door and chew the conversational fragment of cloth with his best girl. It has been the failure of operators to stay by their motor-driven machines that has caused the suppression of the motor in various cities and states. However, I would suggest that it might be brought to the attention of the Kansas authorities that nearly all the large cities, including New York, are now allowing motor-driven machines, and that if the State of Kansas would require that the operating room be thoroughly fire-proofed, and equipped with shutters, which would drop within two seconds of the time a fire started, they could, so far as danger is concerned, feel perfectly free to allow modern, up-to-date projectors to be motor driven. As to your remarks concerning correspondence schools, I have rather discouraged that proposition, because I firmly believe that not more than one man in ten who begins one of those courses ever completes it. I look upon the correspondence schools as being a very slick book-selling scheme more than anything else, the one saving mark being that the books usually are really very good ones, though the price for the course is generally about five times what the books ought to sell for.

Regarding Photometry.

On page 47, January 3rd issue, appeared a letter from Joseph H. M. Smith, Fort Worth, Texas, regarding certain experiments he had made with the arc. G. H. MacClellan, of the General Electric Company, Schenectady, New York, comments on brother Smith's article as follows:

> I have read the letter on "Photometry" by Mr. Jos. H. M. Smith, of Fort Worth, Texas, and would say that, with one or two exceptions, Mr. Smith's figures are right, as far as I am able to determine. Tests were taken in our laboratory with four different methods of projection; one using direct current with resistance; another alternating current with resistance; a third, alternating current with a transformer; and fourth, alternating current with a mercury arc rectifier. The following results were obtained:

WATTS CONSUMED PER HOUR FOR A GIVEN CANDLEPOWER.

Candlepower	D.C. With Resistance	A.C. With Resistance	A.C. With Transformer	A.C. With Rectifier
4000	1900	5800	1700	1300
5000	2250	6900	2200	1500
6000	2600	....	....	1800
7500	3100	....	....	2250
10000	3800	....	....	2700
12000	4400	....	....	3200
16500	5500	....	....	3900

We also find that for a given current consumption the following candlepower is obtainable, using direct and alternating current:

Arc Amperes	Candlepower Using A.C.	Candlepower Using D.C.
20	624	4900
25	894	6220
30	1700	8750
40	1830	12000
60	4650	.....

Mr. MacClellan is in the Mercury Arc Rectifier Department where many experiments have been made. His article, therefore is authoritative, and we thank him cordially for this contribution. It will undoubtedly be of much interest and of value to operators.

High Voltage.

Edgar Ternens, Clarksburg, West Virginia, sends in $5.50 for one year's subscription and the Handbook, and says:

> Am going to start building the Dixie Theater in a few days. It will be twenty-two by seventy-two feet, accommodating about 250 people. Its location is in a suburb called North View. My juice will come from the traction company's lines and will be 550 volts d.c. Will you please advise me how to control this high voltage?

It will depend somewhat upon what terms the company sells you current in. If you pay a flat rate it won't make any difference to you, financially, whether you break down the voltage with a rheostat or in some other way, but if you are going to pay according to the wattage consumed then you had better get a 550-volt motor and a 70-volt d.c. generator, because using 550-volt current through a rheostat is enormously wasteful. Your arc voltage will be about 48 and the wattage consumed in projecting your picture will be the number of amperes used multiplied by 48, whereas, the total wattage consumed in the arc and the resistance will be the amperes used multiplied by the line voltage. Suppose you used 40 amperes: 48 x 40 equal 1,920, the watts actually used in projecting your picture; but you are taking from the line 550 x 40, or 22,000 watts, so that you are actually using only 1,920 watts, and wasting more than 20,000, all of which must be paid for if you are paying so much per k.w. You will find this matter fully set forth in the Handbook, page 123. If you conclude to use resistance, very likely the power company from which you get current can supply you a cast iron grid rheostat which can be made to answer; otherwise I would advise you to have the Cutler-Hammer Manufacturing Company, 50 Church Street, New York City, make you a special resistance.

Operators Are you perfectly satisfied with the results you get on the screen?

"THE INSCRIPTION" (Lubin), January 13.—We have been watching Louise Huff for several pictures and feel sure that with care and attention she will make a very effective actress; but also feel sure that she is not one at present. She is very young, has imagination and a measure of charm; but lacks naturalness. This picture is by George Terwilliger and was produced by Edgar Jones, who also plays a role too young for illusion. As producer, with the help of a good camera man and plant he has made some thoroughly delightful scenes filled with poetry, especially those love-making scenes in and near a fine old Southern mansion. The story is commercially acceptable.

"DOWN LONE GAY WAY" (Patheplay), January 13.—Marred by the picture of a horse which is made to tumble head first down a steep incline and by the pitching of a man over the lip of a rock, this picture of a hold-up and its consequences lacks convincing humanity in places where it isn't trite. It is one of the weakest Patheplays by the Western company in some weeks.

"A NIGHT AT THE INN" (Edison), January 13.—Jeanette L. Gilder has written the script of this romance at the inn of a desperado hoste. It has been pictured with the right machinery such as the windlass and rope in the garret above to let down a death dealing contraption upon the unsuspecting sleeper on the bed below and also the inn itself and backgrounds in general lend themselves very well to give the right impression to the offering. But, until Mabel Trunnelle came into the action as the hoste's sister, there was little illusion in the action and even then it never really gripped the spectator. Richard R. Ridgeley produced it. It seemed to interest.

"ANGEL PARADISE" (Selig), January 13.—A picture with a fine idea that makes itself effective by its grace and perhaps in spite of rather awkward handling by producer and players. Paradise is a rough town in Arizona and the "angel" who comes to it is a small child the daughter of an invalid. She wanders into a bar room just as there is likely to be a bloody duel and by her presence convincingly saves the situation. The author is George Edwin Hunt and Marshall Farnum produced it. It will be liked.

"THE HAND THAT ROCKS THE CRADLE" (Essanay), January 13.—We are hardly made to believe that this story happened in just this way; but it is a pretty story and it has some characters that a human being can sympathize with and so, as an offering to the average audience, is distinctly ahead of pictures with unpleasant stories even though they more vividly convince. The actors are not chosen well for their particular parts—to the emotional player has fallen the role of detective and he is about the poorest sleuth we remember. The people liked it; but will not remember it long.

"ANDY PLAYS HERO" (Edison), January 14.—The second of the series with Andy Clark as a messenger boy, and it makes a dandy offering. Perhaps Mark Swan, the author, has modeled them after other office-boy heroes or their like; but the action is fresh so far and very amusing indeed. Andy saves a little heroine from the rapacious claws of an uncle and in the process—it is quite a melodrama—gets in strong with the audience; he is growing decidedly popular. Charles France is the producer.

"THE REAL MISS LOVELEIGH" (Essanay), January 14.—The newspaper man who runs the "Helps to the Lovelorn Column" as Eveline Loveleigh has a romance of his own, and there's a quarrel due to a letter she finds in his overcoat. And say, it was mighty lucky for him that he held that particular position on the journal—she writes in for advice. It is new, sprightly in the way it is handled and seemed to please the audience. Perhaps the newspaper man was not so well chosen to play that particular part as was the girl, Ruth Hennessy, to play hers.

"TIMING CUPID" (Vitagraph), January 14.—Beginning with farce and adding a little satire and then a bit of romance has made a very pleasing offering almost salad-like in its crispness. It is amusing, and made a good deal of hearty laughter among a pleased audience. Wallie Van is the hero of it, and his need of finding a wife in a month makes him a very amusing "lady-killer" at a dance, from which he goes home early and in disgust to pick up a gold mesh bag with a card in it—Miss Lillian Walker. Her pa doesn't want her to marry him, but she does. Edwin M. LaRoche is the author, and it was produced by Captain Henry Lambert.

"CONSCIENCE AND THE TEMPTRESS" (Selig), January 14.—A carefully staged picture with story and idea along often trodden lines. If must have been very easy for its author (it shows no authority), N. MacGregor, to put it down on paper. It shows a knowledge of how to put scenes together and a fair memory of other pictures. The producer, Malcolm Douglas, has made some acceptable scenes, especially those simple ones at the older women's home, and Adele Lane, the temptress, Miss Johnson, her maid, Lillian Hayward, the man's mother and Edward Wallock as the man give something of entertainment.

"COL. HEEZA LIAR'S AFRICAN HUNT" (Patheplay), January 14.—An animated cartoon by J. R. Bray which is full of fresh fancy, at times very humorous and that made the audience laugh heartily again and again. It is surely a popular number.

"THE SEVENTEEN MILE DRIVE" (Patheplay), January 14.—Sharing the same reel with the cartoon is this beautifully photographed scenic, mostly of tumbling billows and rocks. There are landscapes, but it shows mostly the sea. The tones of the clear pictures are lovely. The photography is artistic.

"BLUE BLOOD AND RED" (Selig), January 15.—The fore part of this picture, written by W. E. Wing, is rather desultory in its development; it is some time before the plot thread gets to work. But later, when the pampered Eastern woman braces up and goes to rescue her husband from the bandits, it is decidedly interesting and worth while. Good photography and pleasing scenes help maintain the interest. A pleasing Western story.

"BASEBALL STARS" (Vitagraph), January 15.—A few brief pictures of a ladies' team and a Chinese team.

"THE BRUTE" (Vitagraph), January 15.—On same reel with above. This picture is well named, for the drunken husband was surely a brute. The boy's efforts to gain his love furnished some pathetic touches. The father, after his awakening, falls over a cliff in order to let his wife enjoy life again. This is very much on the seamy side of life, but has the merit of sincerity.

"WOOING THE SALES LADY" (Melies), January 15.—This introduces two French actors, M. Lorin and Mlle. Davrieres. He impersonates a delivery girl for a big milliner's establishment. The fun is farcical, but in better tone than usual. The glimpses of Paris parks and landmarks were interesting. Amusing French comedy.

"HOW THEY STRUCK OIL" (Biograph), January 15.—Quite an amusing comedy, in which a man washing oil from his hands in a creek leads a family to suspect they have a petroleum gusher. This furnishes some quiet chuckles.

"OUT-BLACKED" (Biograph), January 15.—This is a clever comedy, based on a plot that has been used before in a different way. The judge's daughter, to whom he is supposed to be very much attached, is kidnapped. He refuses to pay the ransom demanded and asks that $5,000 be paid him if he takes her back. Quite diverting.

"THE STORY OF THE OLD GUN" (Essanay), January 15.—In this Western offering the old sheriff tells the story of the gun to the impressionable youth. The fighting scenes in the mountains were well put on, but the narrative seemed a little vague in development. The scenic effects were pleasing.

"PATHES WEEKLY NO. 5," 1914, January 15.—Numerous scenes of interest in this, from hunting jack rabbits in Utah to dancing the tango. As a whole the reel is one of average interest.

"IN MYSTERIOUS WAYS" (Lubin), January 16.—The story is slender. A jealous wife, aroused by the village gossip, looks from her porch and sees in the road below, her husband riding with a woman. She evidently cannot understand that if her husband was disposed to be gay certainly he would select some other road for a ride than the one passing his own dwelling. The incident of the falling from the wall of the husband's picture at the same time that the original slips on the cliff is no more convincing than is the later rescue.

"ONLY ONE SKIRT" (Kalem), January 16.—There is some good comedy in this half reel, and it is made by Ruth Roland, John Brennan and Marshal Neilan.

"THE LORD MAYOR OF LONDON" (Kalem), January 16.—On the same reel are these views of the Lord Mayor's show and other topical scenes in England which will interest.

"A MESSAGE FROM ACROSS THE SEA" (Selig), January 16.—A rather pretty story, although the device of showing in a Western picture house a topical picture taken in Norway is a new way of forcing a situation. A cameraman taking a scenic or a local picture of a fishmarket does not ordinarily take so many feet of so ordinary a scene or persist until the conclusion of a bit of drama. Harold Lockwood and Mabel Van Buren are the young couple who leave Norway and come to America.

"CUTEY'S VACATION" (Vitagraph), January 16.—A comedy based on the scarcity of men at a summer boarding house. Wallie Van is the lone male. Flora Finch is one of the women greeting him and so also is Lillian Walker. The latter looks her prettiest and Miss Finch looks her worst—which in comedy is sometimes her best. She makes a lot of fun, and so do the others.

"WAIFS" (Biograph), January 17.—A pathetic picture with an old world atmosphere that suggests Hans Christian Anderson's stories. Its foci of greatest interest lie in an old and crusty cobbler and his grandchild whom he takes in without knowing who she is—he has refused to be reconciled with a daughter who has married against his will. A rich grand aunt plays the role of ogre and the whole is quite like a fairy story. It is sentimentally produced but is designed to please the majority.

"THE LAST SCENE OF ALL" (Edison), January 17.—A charming offering of acting—Edison acting is mighty good now-a-days. By these players, all of them, but especially by John Sturgeon and Sally Crute, a love story of an actor is made real and even poignantly interesting to us. It is revealed in the dream pictures of an old and dying actor who is seated in his garret, and turning the leaves of his scrap book. Each page brings its vivid memory of stage triumphs, of love, of professional jealousy, of sorrow which becomes the tyrant of the man's soul and finally of death. The audience gave it emphatic marks of its appreciation. Maurice Lewis is the author and Ashley Miller produced it.

"BRONCHO BILLY, GUARDIAN" (Essanay), January 17.—A pleasing picture lively in action and acceptable in sentiment and well put on. It will be liked.

"RED HAWK'S SACRIFICE" (Kalem), January 17.—The situation and its development are not remarkable for freshness; but the story has been skillfully handled, both by author and director and it is decidedly exciting. There is every reason to believe that it will make a strong, popular appeal.

"A SERVANT OF THE RICH" (Lubin), January 17.—A queer story quite impossible in any real society; but perhaps and in a way true to human nature so far as motives go. We didn't find it interesting at all. The audience watched it. George Terwilliger is the author and it was produced by John Ince.

"THE JANITOR'S FLIRTATION" (Edison), January 19.—Another of Dan Mason's janitor pictures in which Yale Boss does a female impersonation and flirts with the janitor while his friends get the janitor's big wife, Jessie Stevens, and a very material witness. It tickled the audience and will go very well. Dan Mason, the author, as usual has the leading role as the janitor. It was produced by Charles Seay.

"OSTRICH FARMING IN SOUTH AFRICA" (Edison), January 19.—Sharing the same reel with the foregoing is this clear picture of an industry, which, though it has been done in film before, is of interest still.

"THE ETERNAL DUEL" (Lubin), January 19.—A Mexican story with little of real Mexican atmosphere. It is a melodrama and affords enough suspense and action to make it pleasing to the majority. It is acted well, too, and the players are pleasing; but aside from this there is little to distinguish it. The author is Will M. Ritchey and it was produced by Bert Bracken.

"PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 6" (January 19).—A fair number.

"QUANTRELL'S SON" (Vitagraph), January 19.—A war-time picture produced and written by Robert T. Thornby. Its scenes are done in a homely, pleasing way; but not all of them are powerfully convincing. The story is well told and it makes a very fair offering.

Licensed Specials

"THE ADVENTURE OF THE ACTRESS'S JEWELS" (Edison), January 12.—This is the first of a series to be devoted to Octavius, amateur detective. The wonderful youth is something of a sissyboy, a burlesque character with just enough truth to "get over" and be funny. Yet the laughter is all at Octavius, never with him, and the humor that he furnishes is one of the picture's lesser assets. The best thing in this first picture is the good story, with excellent situations that are freshly amusing. It is ably acted throughout and kept alive with suspense. Barry O'Moore is the leading man; the producer is Charles M. Seay, and the author is Frederick Arnold Kummer. It pleased the audience markedly.

"THE HEART OF A GYPSY" (Cines), January 13.—A two-part special without much of a plot and with slow action. A good deal of the photography is obscure; but there are some poetic scenes. The story, such as it is, has been acted in the classical convention with grace and much beauty of pose; but this also has hindered the action. Yet the picture makes a fair offering.

"THE MASKED DANCER" (Vitagraph), January 13.—A picture in two parts that the man who makes the program will take pleasure in. It has a convincing background of Mexican life, and while we have had many others they are not too common. The story interests though it cannot be called strong, nor, except at moments, dramatic; but there is through it continuous and clear action, if it doesn't always progress speedily. It has some Mexican dancing; indeed, it is by learning to dance that an American wife of a mining expert living in the southern republic is able to win back her husband who has become infatuated with a senorita bonita of a Mexican dance hall. There is a pretty sensuousness in some of its scenes. W. A. Tremayne is the author and Burton King produced it. It was made by the Western company, with Myrtle Gonzales, Beatrice Dominguez (who is the picture's center of interest whether the author wanted her to be or not), George A. Holt and George Cooper, who in the greaser divekeeper is as convincing as in any role we have seen him take.

"PERILS OF THE WHITE LIGHTS" (Kalem), January 14.—A two-part offering that will go strong in villages, but will be liked in cities, too, especially with the simpler audiences. It is a homely melodrama with overdrawn virtue and villainy, with its hands clean and yet with its pretentions of handling deep and terrible things in city life so as to get a contrast for idyllic love in the country. These simple melodramas, what dear, delightful, wholesome frauds they are; quite impossible and yet the dream of the simple-hearted majority seems to be in tune with them still. This one features Anna Nilsson as an actress who has been on the stage, has killed a villain and stood trial and been acquitted. She is fleeing from the city, but gets sick on the train and is left in kindly hands to be nursed back to health in a farmhouse where there is a sturdy young man. It is gracefully acted, is pretty and sweet.

"A QUESTION OF RIGHT" (Lubin), January 15.—This story, in two reels, written by Shannon Fife, is elaborately staged. The scene where the wife denounces her grafting husband before the voters has been used before, but it serves to hold the interest. The later scenes are much less conventional. The discovery of the murder and the third degree investigation were dramatically pictured and sincerely acted. The production as a whole is quite strong.

"A THIEF OF HEARTS" (Patheplay), January 15.—A two-reel number, depicting the love affairs of a fickle Frenchman. Engaged to his cousin, he falls in love with a famous songstress. The principal love-making scene was somewhat too fervent. Many of the scenes are very attractive, including that in the Pavilion Du Bois, the fete at the club and the glimpses of French roadways. This is strictly a story of love and jealousy and as such is strongly presented. The bull-fighting scene will strike some observers as brutal; it was certainly staged realistically.

"DEACON BILLINGTON'S DOWNFALL" (Edison), January 16.—In this fine two-reel comedy there is "glory enough for all." Cora Williams, as the Widow Divine, is great. Dan Mason, as Deacon Billington, a type of sanctimonious village hypocrite, will contribute to the fund of amusement in the picture. Frank A. Lyon, as Si Higgins, is right with him. Edward Boulden, as the office boy, does good work in a role that easily might have been overdone. Charles H. France is the director of the script, which is written by Clyde Morey. The story is skillfully told; rather it is built. The situations develop naturally and therefore convincingly. The comedy should be a hit.

"THE CAST OF THE DIE" (Essanay), January 16.—This two-reel special will interest, although the manner in which the chief incident is made to affect the fortunes of the hero is rather improbable. A man about to be arrested on a five-year-old charge—of which, by the way, he is innocent—finds wounded on the highway a man who has just held up a coach and takes him home and cares for him. As the wounded man hears the officers demanding of the housewife the surrender of her husband, the bandit, dying, discharges his pistol. The officers rush in and find a dead man and leave the body, apparently believing that it is their quarry and that he has committed suicide. They pay no heed to the fact that the wound, which they examine, must be radically different from that of a close-up, self-inflicted one. There is some stirring horsemanship during the chase of the posse for the bandit.

"LOCAL COLOR" (Vitagraph), January 17.—A picture that gives Ned Finley—leading man and producer—an excellent chance to portray one of his characters—an actor among the rough mountain folk of North Carolina to get local color for a Broadway show. He happens on a village where there is a feud and falls into the hospitable hands of one of the leading families. Ann, daughter of the cabin, falls in love with him. Catherine Carr, who wrote the script, has woven her plot skillfully, bringing another lover of Ann from the opposite side of the feud and using the mountaineers' hatred of the revenue man as the weapon used by this jealous youth to bring about a tragic ending, after which the actor finds that he too has fallen in love with Ann, who dies in his arms, self-sacrificed to save him from the gun of his rival. It will be liked; there is good action, interesting local color and it is well acted.

"GOOD PALS" (Pathe), January 17.—A decidedly likable and thoroughly romantic picture with its center of interest in a little girl charmingly played by Marguerite Risser. It is a fairy tale kind of story of life before the war. The girl's father goes to the west and it is reported that he is dead. His money, after some remarkably fresh and interesting adventures, is sent to her, but is captured by her ogre aunt, a miser, who makes her the roughest and hardest work and calls her a beggar. She and "Shep," her good pal, manager to weather it through until the father returns and rescues the captured princess. It is just a dandy pipe dream and it has the pleasing quality of a dream all through; that is, it is consistently a dream. Did anyone ever find anything unpleasant in a true pipe dream? Charles Russell plays the father acceptably; Beatrice Moreland, as the aunt, has a role for which she is not quite fitted. An excellent offering.

"TOO LATE" (Selig), January 19.—Not quite artistic enough to justify its two reels; in fact, the first part i smarkedly inferior to the second, which tells a story dramatically. In it, by perfect double exposure scenes, we are shown an old musician at his piano composing, while on the other half of the screen scenes of his early life are telling us his love story; but it is surely weak. The producer had a tremendously difficult job, as the script is written, and thus using a whole reel accents the fact that there can be no suspense in a backward looking story in such a case as this. When the story has caught up and we get action and find the musician Mendelssohn as one of the characters it becomes very interesting, although the acting is not of the strongest. The parlor scene is very pretty. Marshall Farnum produced it from the script of Winifred E. Jensen. The print is not as clear cut as might be.

"TRAPPED" (Kalem), January 19.—The best thing this picture offers is a very well handled chase of a desperate criminal by two detectives. It ends in his taking refuge in the tank of a locomotive, where he is seen drowned. There is the usual love story connected with it and this has quite a Kalem flavor with its heroine rescued from the slums and now happily married, but living in dread of the criminal who is called "her evil genius." She is set free by his death. It is an excellently produced and very fairly acted melodrama and has many lovely scenes perfectly photographed.

"THE MAN" (Reliance), January 21.—Worthy and substantial in its showing of human qualities of the nobler kind, this picture—it is put on and acted strongly and makes a sharp, effective impression—will give spectators something for their money. It is true that the story is not brand new; it has been used several times; but there are plenty of new and good things in it. There are the love scenes when the too trusting girl meets the mining engineer and falls in love with him. Not quite so fresh, but also good, is the way the "man" who truly loves her is shown as compelled to watch it all helplessly until the engineer tries to ride away and then he rides after and brings him back to marry her.

"UNTO THE WEAK" (American), January 17.—This village story has pleased nearly everyone who sees many pictures or reads many stories and in this picture will please again—such stories please as often as they can be made convincing. The charitable man finds a young mother in distress and takes her in. It raises quite a disturbance in the community and he and she are even insulted after church. But it proved in the end that the minister's son has been the cause of the mother's distress and he is forced to marry her. There is a measure of freshness in it and in a measure it fails to convince; but taking as a whole, it will entertain.

"THE ELUSIVE DIAMOND" (Thanhouser), January 23.—A good offering, full of snap and go and acted acceptably. Mignon Anderson, as the secretary of a woman of great wealth, is sent with a $20,000 diamond. She has an exciting adventure with crooks and makes a truly startling escape. There are pretty scenes and many popular elements. It should go well.

"TURKEY TROT TOWN" (Thanhouser), January 18.—No plot, just turkey trotting; in fact, everybody's doing it in that town. That is all.

"HER LOVE LETTERS" (Thanhouser), January 20.—A very pretty picture; but not powerfully acted at the critical moment, it loses the strength that the author of it, he is not known to us, had a right to expect. The young wife and mother on a voyage alone is wrecked and her husband thinks her dead. He finds some love letters and thinks ill of her. She is rescued and comes home. The husband receives her, but we are left in suspense as to how he will treat her and this makes an excellent situation. The letters prove to belong to a friend of the wife.

"THE RING" (Majestic), January 11.—Opening with love and jealousy in a sweatshop, this picture's story works out through a tragedy to a happy ending. It has popular qualities in its optimistic sentiment, its pleasant characters and its natural acting. The story is conventional, but simple and direct.

"WHEN THE CAT CAME BACK" (Princess), January 16.—The Newlyweds have a boarding house quarrel. This gives a chance for some pretty scenes and then there's a making-up. A pretty offering that won't attract much special attention, but will please.

"WHAT THE CRYSTAL TOLD" (Majestic), January 18.—Not much construction and not powerful, this little short story interests. Its heroine is a girl who has been ruined by a man who has become "the man higher up" and, as a crystal gazer, she helps the district attorney to "get" him. It is not a white slave picture. It isn't strongly convincing, but that it will entertain the many cannot be denied. Such offerings are not elevating nor truthful. The acting especially of the early scenes is effective and praiseworthy.

"THE POWER OF THE MIND" (Majestic), January 20.—The ending situation of this picture (in which the paralytic husband becomes able to struggle with a burglar in order to save his child) perhaps saves it as an offering to the public. The developing situation, the paralytic's jealousy of the young doctor, his attempt to commit suicide, not only fail to convince, but leave a bad taste in the mouth. The picture's story is not authoritative and, except as a money maker, not at all worth while.

"THE LACKEY" (Majestic), January 17.—Slight but effectively pictured and made impressive, this little story gives good entertainment and will be liked. The father of a very pretty girl finds that his butler is in love with her and discharges him. That night a burglar breaks in and the lackey heroically saves her from the vengeance of the crook (her father is judge and had sentenced him). Later the father wants to shake hands with him, but he proudly tells him that he is a lackey and goes out. There is more than mere sentiment in this picture. It is a fine bit of picture making.

"FIRES OF CONSCIENCE" (Nestor), February 4.—Wallace Reid and Miss Davenport play the leads in this drama, which has for its theme the power which conscience exerts on a man. This is brought out in an interesting story telling of the meeting between two prospectors in the midst of a howling desert. Some good scenes in the desert land are shown.

"WALT'S PHOTOGRAPH" (Komic), January 15.—Walt has all the photographs he needs and all inscribed to the girl he loves most devotedly. He distributes them too widely. There's a laughable moment when we see him coming home to the boarding house all unconscious that there is trouble waiting for him in the hall. He gets his.

"THE VAPOR BATH" (Komic), January 15.—Sharing the reel with the foregoing is this farce along often-trodden lines. The gouty father of the girl is locked by her lover in a vapor bath with the steam turned on until he will consent to accept him as son-in-law. The best in it comes at the very end, when the exasperated dad thinks he is getting back at the fresh youth, but makes a mistake.

"CHASING GLOOM" (Komic), January 8.—The comical character is made to laugh at the price and preciousness of eggs. We don't believe it will make much hearty laughter in the spectators.

"THE SERVANT PROBLEM" (Komic), January 8.—Sharing the same reel is this speedy, but not very new, farce, in which a young couple have trouble with servants. The man is too attentive to the maids and the wife makes her husband jealous when they try men servants. There's lots doing in it and we know that it will please many spectators.

"THE GERM IN THE KISS" (Powers), February 2.—The Count who appears as one of the principal actors in this comedy has the misfortune to fall in love with the daughter of a surgeon, who does not believe in moustaches or kissing because both are full of germs. The troubles of the Count, who has a very large moustache and is very fond of kissing, are rather amusing.

"WHEN BILLY PROPOSED" (Nestor), January 30.—In this bright little comedy Billy, a fat man who fails to win the heart of a pretty heiress, is led to transfer his affections to her sweetheart, disguised as a girl. Whenever a man appears in a photoplay disguised as a girl, there is always a great deal of fun and excitement. This is particularly true of this film. It will win many laughs.

"AT THE CROSSING" (Eclair), February 1.—A well handled fire is the feature of this offering. Its story is fair, but not convincing. Barbara Tennent's acting helps it out some, but we have seen very many of these tramps getting revenge on some judge in pictures.

"THE FOURTH PROPOSAL" (Rex), February 1.—Quite a pleasing light offering, in which Robert Leonard proposes in turn to four girls. The last accepts him, but the first three repent of their hasty rejections when they learn he has money. A rather funny chase scene follows.

"SLIM AND THE DYNAMITERS" (Frontier), January 29.—A ranch comedy of about average interest, in which part of the characters disguise as Indians and some real Indians also appear. Some of the situations are quite amusing.

"A FREAK TEMPERANCE WAVE" (Joker), January 28.—A low comedy number, featuring Max Asher as an intoxicated husband. The escape of the menagerie causes some amusement, but the tone of the production is not very pleasing.

"LITTLE BILLY'S TRIUMPHS" (Keystone), January 29.—Little Billy is a character and has many friends. This little story played by him and his young playmates, so to speak, is truly entertaining and as a relief from heavier offerings and from the rougher stuff that seems still needed in most houses, it should be a comfort to the exhibitor. Charming is the right word for it. A most likable offering.

"CALAMITY ANN IN SOCIETY" (American), January 31.—Calamity Ann's natural roughness finds contrast in her surroundings when she inherits a fortune and a grand house full of "stuck up" servants. There is little original or really amusing stuff in the picture from first to last, except the plight of the donkey which, of course, she has to take with her to her new home. It is designed for the rough and tumble liking part of the audience.

"THE DOUBLE CROSS" (Keystone), January 26.—Ford Sterling, with his queer jumps and comical antics makes this truly a laughter-giving offering. That it is amusing and an excellent offering for the tired spectator is about all that can be said of it.

"THE HEART OF A WOMAN" (Domino), January 29.—A story of revolutionary days, the scenario being written by Wm. H. Clifford. There are first-rate characterizations of Washington, Franklin and General Gage, leader of the British forces. The love story is allowed to get a pleasing start and proves sufficiently novel to hold the interest. Anna Little has the part of the girl. The historical features of the production are perhaps a little inaccurate in places, but in costumings and setting it is very satisfying. This is much better than the average story of the revolution.

"FOR HER BROTHER'S SAKE" (Kay-Bee), January 27.—This story accomplishes but little as regards the characters of the persons in it. The brother is a scapegrace, whose sister keeps him in funds. When he thinks he has killed a man in a saloon brawl, she takes money from her father to aid him. The scenes are full of action and have a correct Western atmosphere, but the story lacks any great appeal.

"IN THE YEAR 2014" (Joker), January 31.—This film story looks ahead 100 years, when women will be in charge of all work and men their employes. The idea is an amusing one and brings out many smiles, but it is not the highest type of comedy. Max Asher has the leading role.

"A COINCIDENTAL BRIDEGROOM" (Powers), January 30.—A picture story which contains too much of a disagreeable nature, including a suicide, an abandoned girl and a case of intoxication. Edwin August is leading man. The photography is pleasing and the settings are good, but the plot is hardly of the best type.

"THE DANGEROUS EXPERIMENT" (Victor), January 30.—An imaginative offering by Jack Byrne, with William Wells and Irene Wallace in the leads. Mr. Wells makes a pleasing hero of the athletic type. The villainous-minded student, who rather overplayed his part, studies occultism and exchanges personalities with his rival. Later, when he desires to do so, he cannot repair the evil he has done until the Hindu teacher comes to his aid. This is an entertaining story of the highly improbable sort and is helped by exceedingly fine photography.

"A GRATEFUL OUTCAST" (Crystal), February 1.—In this drama a young girl discovers that her fiancee is a drunkard and marries another man, a novelist, who saves the life of the drunkard some years later. Out of gratitude the outcast finishes a novel which the other has laid aside on account of ill health. This sudden talent of a very much debauched man for novel writing is somewhat a reflection on the profession of writing, but if we will take it for granted that he had learned something of the art in his earlier life, the drama is presentable. Miss White plays the part of the wife.

"THE WHEEL OF LIFE" (Nestor), January 28.—A Western melodrama, better than the ordinary offering in spite of its time-worn plot. The miner takes an injured stranger into his home, who repays him by running off with his wife. The latter becomes a fast woman and in the end is killed with a blow from a bottle in a saloon. The husband at the last burries the wife beside her baby and hurls the false friend over a cliff. A strong offering of this particular type.

"SLIM AND THE DYNAMITERS" (Frontier), January 29.—Western comedy of the burlesque type, with a dash of originality in the sub-titles. Some of the scenes are quite amusing, but the photography is not up to standard in places.

"THE TURNING POINT" (Frontier), January 31.—Action is the strongest point of this melodramatic offering. It was hard to tell whether the leading man was a hero or a villain for a considerable time, which interfered with the suspense. The burning of the house and the struggle between the two men was realistic.

"A ROMANCE OF SUNSHINE ALLEY" (Broncho), January 28.—A prize fight offering, by Wm. H. Clifford. Jimmie, the bootblack, loves a scrap so well that he agrees to fight while out on parole. The judge attends the fight and bets his money on Jimmie. Of course he wins, and thereafter gives the boy choice between marriage to the girl or ten years in jail. This is a brisk little yarn.

Independent Specials

"DIVORCE" (Kay-Bee), January 30.—A two-reel number, by Wm. H. Clifford. This picture of unhappy domestic affairs has a good moral attached. The wife leaves her husband for another, only to find herself bitterly sorry for the step. The small daughter's efforts to provide for the sick father were pathetic and touching. The photography is rather cloudy in places.

"THE TEST" (Victor), January 30.—This three-reel photoplay, written by Capt. Leslie T. Peacock, is unique in plot and well presented. Florence Lawrence plays a dual role, by means of double exposure photography, which in this instance is very successfully employed. She impersonates a young bride and a woman of the underworld, the latter being ingeniously substituted for the former. The fast woman was a little too eccentric to make her later performances possible and the situations do not stand too much analysis. At the same time it is all done delicately and in an absorbing manner. A good release.

"THE SILENT HERO" (Ambrosio), January 10.—This is the type of plot usually termed continental. It concerns a butler who saw his mistress partially disrobed and thereafter became infatuated with her. The husband struggles with the butler on a high cliff in the second reel and the dog brings help at a crucial moment. Not the sort of plot that goes best with an American audience, though it is well photographed and contains many attractive scenes.

"THE REDEMPTION OF STEVE HARDING" (Ammex).—This three-part feature is a Western melodrama that is truly filled with incident and action. It is not too long for the matter it contains and there is no doubt that the average spectator, even considering the fact that there have been many Westerns, will feel well repaid by this one. It has very little padding and is not only vigorous in its business, but has been pictured in tremendous rough backgrounds which have been clearly photographed. A good offering.

"THE WHITE GHOST" (Great Northern).—This interesting feature offering in four parts is notable for its rich staging and its freshly interesting backgrounds. The photography, especially of the interiors—spacious and gracefully furnished rooms in a great manor house—is excellent and the picture has, including some fine exteriors, many lovely scenes. The story, with plenty of action and some animated hunt scenes with many horses and dogs is fresh, is brightened by comedy and is itself as a whole light-hearted and refreshing. The acting is all that could be expected; is substantial and satisfying. It has that sense of relief from the ordinary that is natural in offerings made in any foreign country when the story is acceptable—the relief that comes from the far-away backgrounds and buildings. Without being a great picture it is a very good release to entertain and please.

"THE ROMANCE OF A PHOTOGRAPH" (Victor), January 16.—This two-reel number, featuring Florence Lawrence as a hoydenish girl expelled from college, is quite interesting. She falls in love with the picture of a handsome gentleman crook, who gets into the house and is discovered by the girl. The plot is not entirely convincing as it works out, but is pleasingly photographed and rather novel in conception.

"THE RETURN OF HELEN REDMOND" (American), January 19.—There are popular elements in this two-part special; but awkward construction keeps it from being effective as a whole. Besides the popular appeal in such situations as the mother's denying her own heart its affection (it isn't made to seem a very worthy affection) in order that her little daughter can grow up in a better atmosphere than that to which she has been used, there are many scenes that are pretty in themselves. We daren't call the whole better than fair.

"THE THIEF AND THE BOOK" (Majestic), January 24.—A two-part offering that is commendable for more than one reason. Though the story is far from probable, it has a humanity that will make it popular. It is fairly well acted and the players, including Billie West in the chief woman's role, are pleasing. The backgrounds, especially that rookery run by "old Meg" where the thieves "hang out," are more interesting than usual. There is no lagging in the action and the spectators are not likely to notice the passage of time while watching it. The thief gets a book on electricity and becoming a good electrician gradually grows respectable and later prosperous. It is real poetry to have him in his turn help a girl whom he catches picking his pocket to become a good stenographer. The love story of these two is pleasing. A likable offering.

"ONE OF THE BRAVEST" (Gold Seal), January 27.—Two firemen, members of the same company, appear in this two-reel production as rivals for a girl. By a deliberate misrepresentation the one leads her to believe the other dishonorable and she is induced to marry the rascal. He later becomes a drunkard and at a factory fire is killed while his wife, employed in the factory, narrowly escapes death, but is saved in the nick of time by her old sweetheart. A very good rescue scene is shown near the last and on the whole the film is pretty good. The story is clearly told and holds the interest.

"FROM FATHER TO SON" (Rex), January 29.—Father and son in this two-reel drama are members of a proud, old English family. The father separates his son from an adventuress whom he has never seen, and she turns up again years later in the family as his wife. The son, returned from a campaign in South Africa, recognizes her, but his father will not believe him until one of the servants likewise identifies her. He then kills himself and the adventuress tries to lay the blame on the son, but fails. Some good situations occur.

"FROM FATHER TO SON" (Rex), January 29.—Robert Leonard wrote and directed and plays the part of the son in this two-reel drama of high finance. The father, an old roue, disowns his son for interfering with his insults to a new stenographer whom the son afterwards marries. She has a brother who is a burglar. Fresh from prison, he tries to rob the father, who offers to release him on condition that he steal some information about stocks from the son. The burglar double crosses the old man, who is ruined, and then begs his son for help and forgiveness. A pretty fair offering.

STATIC CLUB HOLDS BALL.

The Static Club, an organization of motion picture cameramen, of Los Angeles, Cal., formed for social purposes, gave a ball on Friday, January 16, which was well attended by the motion picture people of that city and vicinity and their admirers. The proceeds of the event will be used to furnish and beautify the new clubrooms in the Wilson Building, Los Angeles.

NEW THEATER IN LEWISBURG, W. VA.

W. W. Foster, Lewisburg, W. Va., has recently opened in that city the Princess, a moving picture theater. It has a seating capacity of 300, and since the opening has been playing to full houses. It has a large stage and a number of dressing rooms. L. M. Grow is the manager.

TOO MANY COOKS.

By F. H. Richardson.

The old saying "Too Many Cooks Spoil the Broth," is just as full of truth today as when it was when the saying was evolved, possibly hundreds of years ago. Too many bosses on the job seldom or never make for excellence in performance. It is often better to have one superintendent or manager of mediocre ability handle one particular job than to have two high class men trying to boss the same thing.

This has just been exemplified in a certain theater in the Borough of Brooklyn. This company employed what was called a general manager; they also employed a house manager, but unfortunately both the general manager and the house manager are trying to boss the same job and the result is almost anything but pleasing.

One of the men, the general manager, has ideas which are somewhat peculiar, not to say weird. The house is using both vaudeville and moving pictures. They are running the big feature films such as the "Count of Monte Cristo," and three, four, five and six reel productions, but their method of running them is, fortunately, peculiar to that house alone. Taking the "Count of Monte Cristo" for example: they run the first two reels and then two vaudeville acts, then, the audience having meanwhile forgotten what the first two reels were about, they proceed to run the next two, after which the stage is again turned over to vaudeville from twenty to forty minutes, after which, if any of the original audience remain, they will be allowed to view the fifth and last reel of the moving picture. In fact, on one or two occasions the last reel of a feature got lost in the shuffle and was not shown at all.

It is hard to find a term to fit such work as this. Perhaps "silly" would, all things considered, come nearest to it, but it is not hard to find a term to fit the manager who pulls off this kind of a stunt. In fact, we do not have to look around at all to discover a name which covers the case and that is "absolutely incompetent." The house manager, be it said to his credit, protested against this kind of business and finally wound up by throwing up his position rather than stand for such an idiotic performance.

I wonder what this "general manager" would think of the proposition of stopping a vaudeville act right in the middle, running a reel of pictures, and then resuming the aforesaid act. Would that not be a glorious stunt? Yet when he stopped the performance of some of these features to intersperse vaudeville acts, he stopped the performance of actors some of whom are as far superior in recognized ability to the vaudeville "artists" he puts on, as the sun is superior to the moon.

It is unfortunate that managers of this type are permitted to obtain feature films at all, because they simply, in the language of the street, "make a monkey" out of the whole business, and (whisper), themselves and the audience as well. We now have feature films, not all of them but some of them, equal in beauty and absorbing interest to any high class theatrical performance in existance, yet in this theater they are man-handled and maltreated as above described.

This article is not written with any idea of "roasting" any individual. As a matter of fact, the man who has such perverted ideas would not be worth the space consumed in describing his performance, but for the fact that it can be used to point out to others, who might make the same blunder, the utter foolishness of such a proceeding.

ENTERPRISING INDIANA FEATURE EXCHANGE.

The Essankay Feature Company, of Anderson, Indiana, is an exchange that seems to be doing business along progressive lines. This company is not satisfied with merely renting features, but its interest in the exhibitor's welfare is such that it wants to see him win. The Essankay people believe that every feature should be properly announced to get the crowds coming, and to that end they see to it that all their pictures are accompanied by fresh, clean, vigorous and plentiful lobby display of the business bringing kind. Every so often this firm gets out an up to date circular listing all its recently acquired features, for the convenience of its patrons.

THOMPSON WILL WATERPROOF ENGLISH FILM.

F. B. Thompson, vice-president of the National Waterproof Film Co., of Illinois, will be leaving soon for London, England, to install machinery for Waterproof Films, Ltd., a new English company formed to supply waterproof films in that market. This company has a paid up capital of $30,000, and is under the management of Mr. H. A. Browne, well known in the English branch of the trade. Waterproof films are patented in England, and are very popular with those who have used them.

Jack London—"Picture Writer"

In An Exclusive Interview with a World Man the Great Novelist Speaks of the Powers of the Screen—Describes Himself as a Born Realist with Undying Curiosity and Anxious to Visualize Things by Motion Pictures.

By W. Stephen Bush.

JACK LONDON, the famous writer, had come to New York in the unobtrusive and unconventional style which is not only part of his works but part of his life. He hates business, regarding it "as pure waste," and he is averse to publicity, like most men who do not need it. In some way Mr. Roubert, who has launched the filmed version of "The Sea Wolf," had learned of the whereabouts of London and had overcome his unwillingness to be interviewed. But one condition was imposed: the interviewer had to promise not to reveal what London called his "hole in the wall" and having "solemnly affirmed" the writer was forthwith admitted into the modest temporary quarters of the great man.

Great men are always rare among the living, but London has a good right to the title. Barely forty years old, with a fame as wide as the printed page can diffuse it, with almost magic power over ideas and words, the future of London is still before him. The motion picture will add to his fame. He will add to the fame of the picture as a medium of expression.

Jack London evidently abhors those outward signs by which the parlor literateur loves to be known among the marines. He carries no cane, sports no whiskers and is wholly void of glasses rimmed with the shell of the tortoise. His pet aversion is a stiff collar. His clothes are plain in cut and neat in style, but they are not Broadway clothes.

I have never seen more eloquent eyes than the bluish grey pair that looked out of London's head. They shine with the virtues of plain living and high thinking and they gleam with the light of genius.

The entrance of such a man into the field of motion pictures is surely a good sign of the times and a matter of congratulation between all friends of the higher ideals in the world of the screen.

JACK LONDON
The Famous Author in Characteristic Pose.

London's ambition in this world is to visualize things for the benefit of others, "to get the images living in my brains into the brains of others." Hence his friendship and admiration for the motion picture.

"Let me make a confession right here," said London in his singularly persuasive, pleasing voice. "I had not been in a motion picture theater in years when I was called to San Francisco to witness the first exhibition of 'The Sea Wolf.' I was asked to come to the Imperial Theater. I cannot well describe my surprise. Up to that time I had always associated the motion picture with narrowness of space and cheap equipment, but here I saw a theater equal to the finest in the country. It took a minute or two before I could realize the truth of Mr. Roubert's assurance that this splendid theater was devoted exclusively to motion pictures. When I wrote 'The Sea Wolf' the conception of Larson dwelt in my mind in more or less vague outline as figures will shadow themselves forth into the imagination of the fiction writer. After I saw Mr. Bosworth's representation of the part my own vision disappeared and was merged in the personification of Bosworth."

"Do you believe that your stories are filmable and have the latent screen power in them?" I asked.

"I hope so," answered London, "If I may say so without offending modesty. I am a realist and essentially a picture writer. In writing a story I always keep in mind these two motives: First, I want to make the tale so plain that he who runs may read and then there is the 'deeper' underlying psychological motive. In 'The Sea Wolf' there was, of course, the superficial descriptive story, while the underlying tendency was to prove that the superman cannot be successful in modern life. The superman is anti-social in his tendencies and in these days of our complex society and sociology he cannot be successful in his hostile aloofness. Hence the unpopularity of the financial superman like Rockefeller; he acts like an irritant in the social body. I took no part in the actual direction of 'The Sea Wolf," indeed, I would not dare. Mr. Bosworth and I met quite frequently, however, and we discussed points. I easily convinced myself, from the filmed version of the story, that the screen is quite capable of doing justice both to the superficial and the underlying motive of my story. I did not at first believe that such power resided in the screen. On the contrary, I thought the apparent limitations of the screen were inherent. Now I have become hugely interested in the motion pictures, I am getting the habit, I am beginning to study them and learning to tell the difference between the good and the bad. Yes, I thought that the screen was all right for landscapes, events, etc., but of its real might I had no idea."

How much the world may expect to see in the future, when the pen of London has furnished the leads for the screen in the portrayal of Nature and of Man may easily be inferred from this strain of the famous writer's talk, which now flowed freely and wonderfully.

"I am," continued London, "possessed of an insatiable curiosity. The big books and tomes in the libraries have not given me for what I searched, I found that if I wanted to learn of things as they were I would have to hunt them myself. I am intensely curious to know what the people in the world are doing, how they live, what their motives are, and this study fills me with everlasting amazement. I have no reluctances of any kind, I am plastic and I am ready to go anywhere. In my eagerness to know the why and the how I am right game for whatever may come up."

All through his talk London would intermingle these colloquialisms with the clearness and splendor of his normal diction, making the few "near-slang" words look a squad of picturesque tramps marching with a magnificent well-ordered army.

"What interests me now intensely," London went on, "are the migratory movements of prehistoric mankind. I devoted two solid years to the study of the migrations toward the West of America, being moved to it perhaps by the fact that my people come from the Middle West. The subject of migration in prehistoric time presents, of course, a mass of dry facts, conclusions and theories and I want to make this dry mass of things live and flash the ideas into the minds of all. There, of course, the motion picture would be my most valuable ally. Ninety-nine per cent. of mankind remembers by eye; we recollect the passage in a book by its position as it remains in our recollection.

Visualization is everything for the teacher and I love to teach, to transmit to others the ideas and impressions in my own consciousness. You may talk to a man about the action of hydrogen and nitrogen and the gases produced by certain combinations and you may explain to him atomic theories to the best of your ability and make but a very faint impression. Take the man to the laboratory and show him these things in action and he has got it. An hundred years ago it was possible for one man to possess in his mind the sum and substance of the knowledge of his generation. Today this is impossible, knowledge has become too diversified and specialized. Think of all the new branches that have developed in chemistry alone; think of the subdivisions of toxicology. In the summarizing of knowledge the motion picture will render no mean service. It will teach by visualization. As to the dramatic possibilities of the motion picture I am now convinced that the screen has no limitations. Recently I was talking with Glen Martin, the aviator, on the picture drama and mentioned my story "Winged Blackmail," expressing a doubt as to the possibility of filming such a story. The aviator scorned my doubts. He said it was entirely possible to follow the carrier pigeons in flying machines. In the story, you know, the blackmailers are traced to their lair by having an airship follow the pigeons to the place where their message would be taken from them. He convinced me in the end and now I think there is nothing beyond the reach of the camera. The camera may be likened to the eye of the public."

London here threw in a glimpse of his own cosmic views, which are interesting always, but doubly interesting to motion picture men because the screen may yet be the chosen instrument for the expression of these views.

"Life," said London, " is a constant struggle between evolutionary and atavistic tendencies; our history moves in a succession of ascending and descending periods. The plasticity of man has never been fully explored or tested but, judging from the plasticity of the lower orders of creation, it is difficult to set metes and bounds on human plasticity. The field for the writer who wishes to treat of this subject is illimitable. Take, for instance, any of the atavistic tendencies, say prize fighting. Personally I love a fight and in many of my stories, as you surely know, there are prize fights. "A Piece of Steak" is a point in instance. Even here, however, I have the underlying motive, the tragedy of the old prize fighter, who sees youth after youth step into the ring, unconsciously and gloriously triumphant. The old broken-down prizefighter now realizes that youth must be served, that his velvet days have gone and that his own end has come. In the portrayal of action, which often is fight, the motion picture is supreme as a medium of expression and it carries the underlying motive, perhaps, better than the alphabet could. What a vista of discoveries in the unseen world stretches before the mind as it contemplates the power of the motion picture in the field of education. The microscopic world still lies largely undisclosed before us. The motion picture will help to unlock many doors. I think every thing with the possible exception of demonstrations in political economy will eventually go through the hands of the filmer."

I left the presence of London with a renewed sense of the gain of such a man's entrance into the field of kinematography. No thought is too large for his mind, no fact is too small for his eye. He has emerged from all his observations and all his speculations from his studies of Browning and his experiences in the South Seas and in the slums of the world with his heart wholly fresh and healthy and beating in the warmest sympathy for all of his fellows.

Now for the Screen Club Ball.

Everything in Readiness for the Swell Event of the Year in Motion Picture Circles.

GET out the "soup and fish," send it to the tailor, have it pressed and let out a little at the waist. You will then be ready for the one real classy event of the year in the motion picture trade—The Screen Club Ball, which is to be held at the Grand Central Palace, 46th Street and Lexington Avenue, New York, on Saturday evening, January 31st.

It is probable that on no other occasion would anyone find so many famous photoplayers in so amiable a frame of mind gathered together for purely social purposes as will be visible to the naked eye on that auspicious evening. One reason for this is because it is their own affair. During the course of a year there are a number of social affairs in the trade at which certain screen stars are guests of honor, but in this instance the actors and directors are the hosts and it incumbent upon each and every one of them to be there, whether announced or unannounced.

Judging from the large attendance at last year's ball and the general eclat (pronounced "eh-kla") of the occasion, this year's affair should transcend in brilliancy and size any social function that the trade has ever known. Anticipating this the arrangement committee secured the largest unoccupied hall in New York for the purpose. The Grand Central Palace is second in size only to Madison Square Garden, but the dancing floor at the Palace is much better than that of the Garden. The committee on decorations has been busy arranging the seating accommodations. These will include thirty-five boxes on the main floor, which will be occupied by the shining lights of the trade. Most of these boxes have been sold, but there are still a few that may be had at fifty dollars each if prompt action is taken. The boxes will seat ten dignitaries each.

The press committee has done splendid work in announcing the event. Preferred billboard locations in New York are now covered with handsome posters in several colors and sizes, ranging from one sheets to twenty-four sheets. The chairman of the committee by his known indefatigability has placed 25,000 lines of publicity matter in out of town newspapers alone, which will no doubt bring a large attendance from other cities in addition to those who would be sure to attend in any event. The souvenir program is practically finished. It will be a work of art and well worth keeping as a memento of the occasion.

The music committee has engaged Ferguson's orchestra of 32 pieces to dispense resonant rythm for the dancing.

Tickets may be obtained at the club rooms at 165 West 47th Street, and from any member of the club. The price of tickets is $2, for lady and gentleman, including wardrobe service.

Creating a Market.

A. H. Sawyer to Devote His Energies to the Merchandising of Pictures—Has Several Projects Under Way.

WHEN A. H. Sawyer undertook the promotion of Kinemacolor nearly three years ago he came to that work with a full knowledge of the exhibition business and the difficulties that beset the exhibitor of motion pictures. Now that he has severed his connection with the Kinemacolor Company it is his purpose to capitalize that knowledge to the best advantage to himself and those who are fortunate enough to ally themselves with him.

A. H. Sawyer.

"To begin with," said Mr. Sawyer to a representative of the Moving Picture World who called at his office at 15 East 26th Street, New York, the other day, "I have formed the A. H. Sawyer, Inc., which will presently release 'Ranger Films' and other Australian productions of the Spencer studios, Sydney, Australia, together with other miscellaneous pictures to meet the requirements of all buyers. In this connection there are some big features coming of which I cannot speak fully at present.

"Another enterprise in which I am interested will handle religious and educational pictures and a third will have to do with the production of adaptations from books and plays, of which I have the rights. This is quite an important connection and is backed with ample capital.

"Still another enterprise in which I am interested is the formation of a circuit of theaters to absorb whatever product I may secure and, to my mind, this is the most important. I have had numerous offers from makers of pictures to handle their product. To make them seems to require no special effort, but when it comes to the task of selling them at a profit there seems to be considerable difficulty experienced. To my way of thinking the manufacturers have started from the wrong end; they have gone ahead making pictures without the least idea of how they might dispose of them. To devise a dependable system of selling is the question that is receiving my most careful attention just now. In this project I am assured of all the capital that will be required to finance the plan as soon as I can get the project in shape.

"There have been several projects along this line, but those who have handled them have not understood the needs of the exhibitor and, consequently, have failed to present the proper solution. It will be my purpose to make a thorough investigation of the several houses to be included in the circuit and adjust the service and the terms therefor, which is a prime consideration."

Mr. Sawyer's experience as an exhibitor and his knowledge of the booking end gained with his Kinemacolor experience puts him in possession of a mass of information that should spell success for the ventures he is about to undertake.

BETROTHED.

Julius Celler, manager of the Park Theater, Fifteenth Street and Fifth Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y., has become engaged to Miss Irene Weily, of Brooklyn. Their wedding day has not yet been announced.

At the Sign of the Flaming Arcs

By George Blaisdell.

NO man or woman interested in matters in any way pertaining to the stage or the screen should fail to read "Richard Mansfield: The Man and the Actor," by Paul Wilstach (Scribner's, 1909). To be sure, it is not a new book; but any book is new to the man who has not read it. This 500-page record of a busy life is jammed with material of absorbing interest. It takes right at the beginning the life of the man who at his death was but three months over fifty years of age—1857 to 1907. It tells of his struggles and of his poverty; for poverty he experienced, in spite of the fact that he was reared in comparative luxury, the son of one of the world's great singers, Madame Rudersdorff. The mother had taken offense at the action of her son in appearing at a week-end party in London as an entertainer, and had cut off his allowance. The son was too proud to indicate his distress. Mansfield at twenty had gone to London, ostensibly to study painting. His heart, however, was in the stage. Entertaining old schoolmates—for he had lived in Boston only five years—had exhausted his pocketbook and credit. He obtained a place in the German Reed entertainments at £8 a week, then a large salary. Every bit of money Mansfield could scrape together went for his wardrobe. His friends crowded the hall for his first appearance. During the evening, and while holding the stage, he sat at the piano. He fainted. He lost his place on account of "nervousness." It was not known that he had not eaten for three days. It was many a year of hard work before he again reached an income of £8 a week. On the morning after his disaster he learned of his mother's displeasure expressed in five languages.

Evil days followed. Sometimes he sold a painting or a poem or a story. Oftentimes he stayed in bed and slept because when awake he was hungry. In 1878 Mansfield obtained the part of Sir Joseph Porter, K.C.B., First Lord of the Admiralty, in a second company Gilbert was forming. For a year his salary was £3 a week. Then he was dismissed because he asked for an increase of 6s. Later he was re-employed in the first company. He created the role of the Major-General in "The Pirates of Penzance," in 1880. Discharged by Gilbert for "daring to change the business set down in my book" Mansfield in 1881 sang in Offenbach's "La Boulangere." Then followed several minor engagements, and in 1882 Eben D. Jordan, a Boston merchant, the first friend from America he had seen since the death of his mother, that winter, persuaded Mansfield to come back to Boston.

Here was a man of twenty-five entering upon the American stage at the period many claim to have been its greatest. Edwin Booth, Laurence Barrett, Joseph Jefferson, Clara Morris, Mary Anderson, Ada Rehan were all at their best. Bernhardt was here in '81 and in '82 Salvini, Irving and Terry came. Also there were Modjeska and Janauschek. Unable to get a place in the drama he was forced to seek operatic work, which he found as the miller in "Three Black Cloaks." His agility in dancing was one of the factors that later secured him the role of the Lord Chancellor in "Iolanthe." A treacherous ankle, sprained two years before in Edinburgh, was the cause of giving up this engagement and applying to A. M. Palmer for a place in the Union Square Stock Company. He was given a part easy for him, but he longed to be assigned to Baron Chevrial, for which J. H. Stoddart was then rehearsing. The latter so feared the part that finally he refused to play it, saying it was not in his line, and Mansfield got it, with many managerial misgivings.

January 11, 1883, was the date of the first performance. It was a triumph for Mansfield, famous in a night and in his twenty-sixth year. "A Parisian Romance" continued until April 7 and then went on tour until May 26. It was at this time that there began the petty persecutions of writers who could not understand the man Mansfield, annoyances that embittered the actor and misled the public. There were twenty-four ensuing years of artistic triumphs and too often financial failure. It was an indomitable will that kept the actor to his task, often of seeking new roles and new plays as opposed to old ones.

Get Mr. Wilstach's book from your library, you who have not already read it, and you will find a treat. You will learn much of a great actor, a firm friend, a lover of children—read his letters to his young son—and of his home; and of a man who was a musician, a painter, a poet and a writer of marked talent.

Frank Bushman, leading man of the Essanay Manufacturing Company, has been in New Orleans for a few days. He writes that he has had fine weather and a reception that he will remember. He sends his regards to his friends in New York, and, what especially is worth hearing, says he will be in New York soon. For the Screen Club ball on the 31st? Let us so hope. Bushman is good to meet. He seems to make a bigger hit off the screen than he does on it—and that's a pretty strong statement.

T. S. Powers, resident manager of the Gordon Photoplay House, Rochester, N. Y., if we may judge from what he says in a recent letter, is an expert in the art of creating in an indifferent mind a love for the motion picture. He recently received a letter from New York introducing to him a man taking up his residence in Rochester. The introduction stated that if Mr. Powers could convert the bearer to motion pictures he would accomplish something the man's wife had as yet been unable to do. "I showed him our plant from cellar to top pennant," writes the manager of the Gordon, "including a walk through the chambers that hold the vitals of the big pipe organ. I found him a good seat and started him right at 8 o'clock with an overture by our symphony orchestra and organ, followed by a Kinemacolor scenic of the Jungfrau, and then Fashions, three good comedies, the Famous Players' three-reel 'Daughter of the Hills,' Imp's three-reel 'The Militant,' and two of New York's high-class singers." Surely for a first lesson in the conversion of a picture follower out of one who is a pronounced music lover it will be admitted Mr. Powers has done exceedingly well.

The many friends of Mrs. J. Arthur Mackley, the wife of the well-known former sheriff of Essanay's Westerns, will regret to learn of the death in Chicago on January 2 of her father, the Rev. W. H. Fosbury. Mr. Fosbury was 74 years old. He was in good health when Mr. and Mrs. Mackley recently passed through Chicago on their way to Los Angeles.

There is a theater in New York that makes a practice of announcing its next picture by inserting the bare title in a blank space above an advertising slide. Over a whisky "ad." the other evening appeared the title of the Essanay release for December 18: "The Trail of the Snake Band." Real humorist, that operator?

W. A. Russell, for a long time master of properties for the Essanay Company, died in Los Angeles on January 11 of tuberculosis. On Tuesday before his death, Mr. Russell had experienced a turn for the worse and it had been decided to send him to Silver City, N. M., on the 12th. The Photoplayers had taken a deep interest in Mr. Russell and gave him every attention.

Received a very kind weather inquiry from Frank Carroll on a photocard, showing the president of the Stellar Photoplay Company with a companion blocking the thoroughfare in one of the narrow ways of old St. Augustine. The passage must be at least six feet wide. It is easy to see by the negligee attire of the men facing the camera there is no 5-below temperature in their vicinity. President Carroll and Director "Bob" Daly send regards to all their friends. Screen Club ball? Poor "Bob"! And he chairman of the entertainment committee, too. The night of January 31 will be a melancholy occasion for some in St. Augustine. Yes, and in other places, too. The Famous Players will be on the water bound for Cuba. Other Screeners are in Jacksonville. Many more are in the West. Why not another year put over this ball early in November and give more of the boys—and girls—a chance to be in on it?

Walter MacNamara, photoplay writer and Imp director, has organized a feature company with a capital of $100,000. The corporation will bear the name of the organizer and Mr. MacNamara will be the president. It is the intention to film big subjects, psychological and historical. Mr. MacNamara says he will now have abundant means to do the things that for a long time he has been ambitious to do. He expects to expend $25,000 on his first subject. He will sail for the British Isles in about three weeks. With him will go the nucleus of a company, which will be augmented abroad. It is his intention to take his exteriors first, photographing his interiors on his return, and, of course, bringing back with him such players as the circumstances may indicate. Mr. MacNamara will write and produce his own stories.

Paul W. Panzer, Patheplayer, lectured on Tuesday evening to a crowded house at the Nostrand Theater, Brooklyn. With his bits of notable scenes from well-known picture plays, the taking and making of which he described, his audience was highly entertained for three-quarters of an hour and manifested its pleasure by generous applause during the course of his talk.

CHICAGO LETTER

BY JAS. S. McQUADE.

By James S. McQuade.

THE Chicago American paid the appended editorial tribute to the moving picture last week:

"Now comes the photoplay with its pictorial visualization of the great novels of to-day and of all time. The motion picture may never give the complete satisfaction which the book affords, but often it will prove more adequate than the drama for the purpose of telling the story.

"Novels of past times, like 'Quo Vadis?' or the 'Last Days of Pompeii,' which are prolix, disgressing, abounding in details of sumptuous festivals or desperate adventure, cannot be presented adequately on the stage, but they can, when sufficient money is spent, be reproduced vividly on the moving picture screen.

"Moving pictures of all tales of adventure and episodes of great action are more vivid than any possible word descriptions may be, however brilliant are the literary talents of the writer.

"When Colonel Roosevelt made his hunting trip over the African game trails he wrote fully of his expedition. Motion picture companies followed the American hunter and with their films covered the region he touched with his pen. These films, although presented independently, did much to illustrate the Colonel's book.

"For the purpose of fixing impressions of things, which the ordinary observer never gets to see, the photoplay is head and shoulders above any book of travels or adventure that ever was written.

"For the purpose of renewing one's memories of a great novel, or illustrating a great man's biography, or a great epoch in history, nothing can compare with the photoplay.

"Its possibilities are only touched upon. Its sphere of realization (by reel-ization) is a new world just discovered and as yet little explored.

"Of course, there is much that is cheap, tawdry, valueless, vulgar, deceitful, about the moving picture business. It has no more freedom from faults than has any other human manifestation. It cannot drive talented actors from the stage or silence gifted singers or put a stop to the author's gift of word-painting.

"But it does and will continue to fulfill a function in supplementing printed books of fiction and travel, of history and action, to a degree which can never be rivaled by the theater.

"What the photoplay needs to-day is to have more BRAINS put into its direction and expansion as a power for entertainment and education."

Seeking to Revive Old Amusement Protective League.

A number of exhibitors and exchange men of this city met in the Sherman House, Friday, Jan. 16th, for the purpose of resuscitating the old Amusement Protective League. Joseph Hopp opened the session with a few remarks on the benefits to be conferred by an organization such as the old Amusement Protective League. He stated that the object of this new organization would be to protect those interested in the moving picture industry in Chicago against unfair legislation.

Mr. Hopp was then chosen to act as temporary chairman and, in turn, appointed a temporary secretary. A general discussion on the censorship problem and movements by city officials against the moving picture theater, followed. D. L. Swartz, an exhibitor, suggested that the co-operation of the International Motion Picture Association and other organizations directly connected with the business be secured. A motion to that effect was carried.

A committee of five was then appointed by the chair to make the necessary arrangements. A committee was also appointed to draw up a new constitution and by-laws for the proposed organization. It was decided that the old charter and name—Amusement Protective League—be retained. The meeting then adjourned.

Those present were: G. W. Ford, the Alvin Theater; Paul Polivka, the Overland; A. A. Kramp, the Palmer; Tom Patrous, the Stadium; J. Goldberg, the Bismark; Paul Sittner, the Criterion; J. V. Seever, the Alcazar; D. L. Swartz, the Erie; A. G. Spencer, General Feature Film Co.; F. H. McMillan, World's Special Film Corp.; Phil H. Soloman, Warner's Features; Wm. F. Wreden, Theater Supply Co., and Joseph Hopp, Union Film Co.

The next meeting will be held in the Sherman House, on Monday, Jan. 26th, at 10:30 a.m.

It is not just clear why the name, Amusement Protective League, should be used in connection with any organization that stands for moving pictures. In fact, it is not at all clear as to why this old organization and its effete name should be dragged from the charnel house. The business will get along without it. Something better can be easily created by men truly representative of the entire business.

Big Selig Zoo Under Construction.

Thomas S. Nash, superintendent of the Selig plant in Los Angeles, accompanied by Mrs. Nash, arrived in the city Jan. 13th and returned to the Coast, Wednesday, Jan. 21st.

The visit of Mr. Nash was both business and social in its nature, for he spent most of the time out at the big Polyscope plant here since his arrival. Mr. Nash informed me that eight sets of the "Kathlyn" series have already been finished, which leaves five more two-reel sets to be made. Large masses of people are used in these pictures, varying as the occasion calls for it. Sometimes several thousand are used; at other times five or eight hundred.

Other productions are being made contemporaneously with the "Kathlyn" series, five directors being engaged steadily in the production of regular and special feature subjects.

A big force of men is working at present on the new animal building in the Selig Zoo. This fine home for the Selig wild animals—which, by the way, will be the largest structure of its kind in this country—is modeled after the new Lincoln Park Zoo, in Chicago.

In about six months the zoo will be well advanced to receive the finishing touches, such as the beautifying of the lawns, the filling of the lakes, etc., etc., within the spacious grounds. Monster palms are being transplanted to the zoo demesne, which will be a veritable beauty spot when completed.

Early last week Mr. Nash received a telegram from "Fritz," the well-known "Mr. Polyscope," Los Angeles, to the effect that Miss Kathlyn Williams had been elected by an overwhelming majority to lead the grand march in the Photoplayers' Ball, on Valentine's night, Feb. 14th; also that Fred Mace, of the Mutual Corporation, was elected president, and Mr. Nash, a member of the control board.

The "Fritz," mentioned above, has charge of the commissariat department which cares for the wants of the Selig Zoo and for the Selig Los Angeles studios. He is the one man in Los Angeles who appears to be known by everybody.

Big Theater for Children Proposed in Chicago.

A plan to build a moving picture paradise for boys in the "Loop" was announced the other day by John Coleman, financial secretary of the "Big Brothers'" philanthropic organization, this city. According to Mr. Coleman work will be begun the coming spring. The theater will have a seating capacity of 4,100, and six reels of pictures will be shown for one cent.

"We are going to take the boys away from the moving picture shows which are injurious to their morals," said Mr. Coleman. "All crime pictures will be barred. So will questionable love films.

"The site of the theater has not been chosen, but it will be in the loop."

Jack Robbins, head of the "Big Brothers" and a well-known sociologist, has submitted the final plans. They call for help from the city council. Mr. Robbins recently gathered twelve of the toughest boys in the country and sent them to a farm near Reno, Nev., where they will be given a chance to become good citizens.

If this project goes through, Chicago will have the first strictly children's moving picture theater in this country.

Miss Spoor Elected President of Alumnae.

The alumnae of Miss Mason's school for girls, at The Castle, Tarrytown-on-the-Hudson, N. Y., gave their annual luncheon on Jan. 13, at the Hotel La Salle, this city.

The following officers for the year were elected: Miss Gertrude Spoor, president; Miss Lloyda Smith, vice-president; Miss Catherine Spry, secretary; Miss Ruth Patrick, treasurer; Mrs. Lloyd Smith, Mrs. George K. Spoor, Mrs. George E. Spry, Mrs. Theodore Smith, Mrs. P. L. James, of Lake Forest, and Mrs. Henry Farnum honorary directors. Miss Mason delivered a lecture and showed moving pictures of the pupils at work. Pupils from seventeen different classes of the school were in attendance at the luncheon and meeting.

Rigorous Fire Prevention Orders in Chicago.

J. C. McDonnell, chief of the bureau of fire prevention and public safety, sent out notices, Jan. 15, to the twenty-two battalion chiefs of the fire department and to Chief of Police Gleason calling attention to the violations by crowding and exit obstructions in moving picture theaters. In the letters he said:

"Lobbies are being overcrowded by waiting patrons. Exit doors are being cluttered up with advertising matter in frames or on easels.

"Both these practices constitute violations of the city ordinances. Will you aid in correction of these conditions?

"This bureau will concede half the lobby space for waiting patrons, if it be railed off with a two-inch pipe railing. Under no condition must exits be clogged up, however, with waiting patrons or advertising."

In his letter to Chief Gleason Mr. McDonnell asked that police watch all theaters on their beats and close them up if they are found to be violating the ordinances in the manner to which he called attention.

The step was taken on behalf of patrons in cold weather.

On Jan. 18, Arthur Schoenstadt, owner of the Palace Theater, Ashland avenue, near West Forty-Ninth street, was arrested on a charge of violating the fire prevention ordinance. He is charged with having placed obstructions, consisting of three signs, in the lobby of the theater.

Six-Inch Space During Tango, or Patrol Wagon.

In a recent speech before the Evanston Woman's Club, Second Deputy of Police M. L. C. Funkhouser, speaking for the Evanston Drama League, said that he would not tolerate in moving pictures any scenes showing the degradation of women, the hero worship of criminals, the portrayal of crime or the ridiculing of those in authority.

"Eighty-five per cent. of those who attend moving picture shows," he said, "are women and children. Many of the latter are under 15 years of age and nothing harmful to them should be shown."

"Tango dancers must keep a six-inch space between them; they may touch hands, and a man's arm may encircle a fair dancer's waist, but if a couple fails to observe the rule as to space it will mean a ride in a patrol wagon," declared Major Funkhouser. Bunny hugs, or hugs by any other name, will be followed by the unceremonious exit of the dancers, if the second deputy's assistants witness the embrace.

Miss Harriet Vittum, superintendent of the Northwestern University Settlement, at the same meeting stated that moving picure theaters should provide fairy stories for children, and that, owing to the congestion of downtown theaters, young children are forced to breathe air laden with germs.

Miss Vittum evidently would like to see moving picture theaters turned into nurseries, and Major Funkhouser in his zeal would assume divine rights to prescribe a code of morals. The moving picture will outlive all such narrow-minded restrictions, and in a few years one will look back in amazement at these Puritanical outbursts.

Remarkable Vogue of "Kathlyn" Pictures.

With the presentation of the second set of "The Adventures of Kathlyn" in this city, Monday, Jan. 13, managers found they could not accommodate the crowds with their usual number of performances. Extra shows were necessary in almost all the theaters where the pictures were shown.

Special morning performances are being given at many picture houses. The crowds, waiting to get in many theaters, stand in line for hours. Policemen have been called to keep the crowds in line, and Chief of Police Gleason has assigned extra men to the theaters in the crowded districts.

The managers also are having difficulty. Windows and sign cases have been broken in many places where the guards are unable to check the rush. It has become necessary to install extra railings to hold the crowds in line. Even in bad weather "Kathlyn" fans have been known to stand in line for nearly an hour in order to get into a theater.

Hundreds of inquiries are answered at the Tribune office every day regarding places where "Kathlyn" will be exhibited on certain days, and thousands who missed the first installments are anxious to learn where they may see the first part of the interesting subject.

Picture Programs Supplant Vaudeville in the Willard.

M. Lacalsi, an equal partner with Jones, Linick & Schaefer in the Wilson Avenue Theater, purchased their half interest in that house in a deal closed Saturday, Jan. 17, and after Feb. 1 will be in complete control. Mr. Lacalsi is planning to book a better class of vaudeville attractions at the Wilson as soon as he has obtained full control.

Vaudeville has been withdrawn from another of the Jones, Linick & Schaefer houses—the Willard, at Fifty-first street and Calumet avenue. The Willard was closed Sunday night, Jan. 18, to make the necessary changes for straight picture programs. A $10,000 organ will be installed. It will be reopened Monday, Jan. 26.

"There is no significance in this change," said Mr. Linick. "Our patrons in that neighborhood prefer moving pictures to vaudeville, and we're trying to give them what they want. The price will be ten cents, as against the ten-twenty-thirty we charged for the vaudeville. Our downtown houses, the Orpheum, La Salle, Colonial and McVicker's will go along just as they have been."

Chicago Film Brevities.

Leo Feist, the well-known music publisher of New York, with branches all over the world, will soon issue a waltz entitled the "Kathlyn" Waltz, that will be copyrighted in all countries. This waltz has been composed specially, on the order of Wm. N. Selig, by one of the most talented Feist composers.

Down in New Albany, Ind., it is reported, a hitherto respected couple pleaded guilty of breaking into a grocer's bread box and stealing loaves of bread, in order to secure the moving picture show coupons attached. It appears they could not resist the craving—not for food—but for the pictures.

C. A. Anderson, formerly an exhibitor and one of the first members of the Chicago branch of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of America, has established the Anderson Feature Film Service, with headquarters in Room 611, 167 W. Washington street. He is now handling "Ten Nights in a Bar Room," in five reels, for which he holds exclusive rights in Illinois and Wisconsin.

H. G. Immenhausen, who, with Thomas Hennessey, owns the New Standard Theater, 750 N. Clark street, this city, paid us a pleasant call last week and renewed his subscription. The New Standard seats 450 people and charges five cents for General Film Co.'s program. Business is excellent, Mr. Immenhausen stated. Mr. Immenhausen is also interested in the Estelle Theater, Twelfth street and Blue Island avenue, of which W. Doebler is manager. Mr. Immenhausen is manager of the New Standard.

Master Donald Pribyl, the two and one-helf-year-old son of John Pribyl, personal representative of Wm. N. Selig, is one of the proudest youngsters in Chicago just now. He received as a Christmas present an Abyssinia donkey, 29 inches in height and weighing 100 pounds exactly. This full aged and full-grown animal was sent Donald by Lawrence Hagenbeck, son of the famous Carl Hagenbeck, of Hamburg. Donald can boast of having the smallest donkey in America.

John A. Robinson, of the Robinson Circus, Cincinnati, stopped over in the city last week on his way from Los Angeles to his home city. Mr. Robinson went out to witness the production of a few of the first sets of the "Kathlyn" series of pictures, and intended stopping only a few days. Instead, he spent 40 days at the Selig Zoo where, he says, he had the time of his life. When seen he still expressed his astonishment at the extraordinary use of wild animals in these pictures. "It is almost unbelievable how refractory and dangerous animals are handled in these pictures," said Mr. Robinson. "It was really a revelation to me and I regret very much that I could not remain for the completion of the entire series."

A long deferred directors' meeting of the General Film Company, the purpose of which was to elect officers of the company for the current year, was held on Tuesday, Jan. 20, at the offices of the company, 200 Fifth Avenue, New York. The principal business transacted was the election of officers which resulted as follows:

President, J. J. Kennedy, of the Biograph Company.

Vice-president, C. H. Wilson, of the Edison Company.

Treasurer, J. A. Berst, of Pathe.

Secretary, James Braden, formerly attorney for the Motion Picture Patents Company.

This action replaces Frank L. Dyer, who has been president of the company for more than a year; A. E. Smith, the former treasurer, and Paul Melies, the secretary.

"A Soul's Tempest."

Pasquali American Company Shows a Strong Drama in Three Parts, Finely Acted.

By George Blaisdell.

THE producers of this picture describe it as a psychological drama. This is a term much used in these motion picture days, and sometimes abused, but it was a sure hand that applied it in this instance. There are five principals in the cast, and all of them at times reveal the tempest that surges within. It would seem as if the author might well have extended his story beyond the point of the daughter's tragical sacrifice to conceal the mother's dishonor. For we may be sure the living death of the mother constituted a greater tragedy than did the passing out of the younger woman who chose the grave rather than, not alone to marry the lover of the mother, but also to lose the worthy man to whom she was betrothed. A happier termination and certainly a more just one would have transferred the fatal draught from the lips of the girl to those of the guilty man, and for the erring wife then to confess the truth to her daughter's fiance if not also to her husband. However, it is life we are facing and not romance.

"A Soul's Tempest" is splendidly acted. The principals appeared in the "Pompeii" production, which statement will have significance for those who saw this picture. G. Novelli Vidali is Dr. Roberts, the wealthy physician who, on a distant call, leaves the gay assemblage gathered for the formal announcement of his daughter's engagement. Pina Fabbri is Mrs. Roberts, who, at 1 o'clock in the morning, entertains her lover (Louis Mele). Maria Gandini is the daughter who, when she hears loud words in the hall of her home, appeals to her mother for an explanation, and then to her father says the intruder had come to see her. Leo Ragusi is the fiance for whom the father sends in the early hours and tells him that his daughter is unworthy of him and that she is to marry another.

There is much charm in the early scenes. We see Laura opening the package containing the present from her betrothed and later receiving presents from father and mother, with many affectionate touches. At the reception that evening we discover the perturbation of the mother when she greets the Outsider. It is the struggle between loyalty to herself and those nearest to her and the overpowering fascination for the lover. The struggle is repeated as she awaits, in her room, the coming of her lover—she has bid her daughter good night; Laura sits at her writing table penning another good night to the man she is soon to marry.

When the doctor returns home, having been intercepted and informed that his prospective patient is dead, he is mystified at discovering the garden gate unlocked. When he throws on the lights and finds the intruder he demands, after heated words: "For which one of the two did you come?" It is then that the daughter steps into the breach. Although the dialogue is in Italian, it is in the universal language of the picture that we see him, in an aside, say to the distressed girl "I didn't." The father tells the two that, of course, there is but one remedy for the situation. All of these scenes grip and thrill, none more so than the short talk between the father and the fiance, the daughter standing helplessly by.

The daughter goes to the medicine chest and from a small bottle pours a few drops into a glass. After drinking the mixture she gathers in her arms the flowers that came to her from her betrothed and, donning her bridal veil, lies on the bed from which she had the day before arisen in such joyous mood. It is her last sleep.

The picture is well photographed and elaborately staged.

"THE WHIRL OF DESTINY."

A Four-Part Savoia Production Released by the Mundstuk Features.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

THIS feature, made by the Savoia Film Company, of Turin, and released by a new entrant into the feature field, the Mundstuk Features, is entitled to much praise. The plot is strong and clean, the direction thoroughly competent, the acting of the principal characters more than fair, and the settings and the photography of a high order. The titles were made abroad by some man who held a hatchet in one hand and a cheap dictionary in the other, but, as the original titles are going to be recast, this objection will be removed.

The opening scenes show clever acting on the part of the heroine of the story and a fine exhibition of the power of condensing by the director of the play. This standard of quality is fairly maintained all through the picture. The feature will be especially welcome to the exhibitor who wants to cater to the better and larger class of patrons, who prefer clean stories above all others. The dramatic situations in the feature are finely developed, there is an appeal to the heart, for the story deals with men and women of noble character and high motives. The characterization is good throughout with the exception of the son of the lost man, who seemed at times somewhat awkward.

The mysterious disappearance of the husband of the heroine of the story is managed with particular skill. He having discovered that his wife has married him from a sense of duty rather than from love, decides to encourage her belief that he has committed suicide, by putting the jewels and the watch that he wears upon his person into the huge tank filled with the powerful solvent which he had invented. He has realized that the man who had become his partner is the man to whom his wife had given her heart before she married him. He feels that he has no right to accept so great a sacrifice and feigns suicide.

Having left the impression that he has perished in the tank of solvent, he disappears and begins life anew in the far West. Without his aid the company, organized to promote the manufacture of the new solvent, soon begins to lose ground. His partner, who stayed on the ground after his friend's disappearance, dies of heart failure and the inventor's son, to retrieve his fortunes, also goes West. Here father and son meet under most thrilling circumstances. The father has prospered in his new country and returns with the son whose life he saves in an almost miraculous manner to the home of the sorrowing mother. There is a happy ending which motion picture patrons always like best.

CHARLES URBAN IN NEW YORK.

Charles Urban, father of Kinemacolor and head of the Kinemacolor enterprises in this country and Europe, arrived in New York on Wednesday, January 14. He will remain in New York for a few weeks engaged with the affairs of the American Kinemacolor interests.

Manufacturers Advance Notes

DOING GOOD WORK ON "THE SQUAW MAN."

The accompanying engraving is one of the first "stills" sent East from the Jesse L. Lasky studio at Hollywood, California, and is ample evidence of the extent to which the new feature organization is going to make its first release, "The Squaw Man," a most ostentatious production. The scene depicts Dustin Farnum, sailing for America, bidding goodbye to Lady Elizabeth at the departing of the schooner. Later in the story of the play, this schooner burns at sea and, from reports and flashlights already sent in, this scene is one of the most vivid and impressing scenes ever attempted. For the schooner scene, Mr. De Mille purchased outright, a deserted semi-whaler, chartered two tugs to tow it to sea and actually burned the ship to the water's edge then, to comply with the law, was compelled to destroy the hulk with dynamite. During the burning scene, Mr. De Mille and Oscar Apfel narrowly escaped suffocation by inhaling sulphur smoke.

"The Squaw Man" will be released February 15. Already most of the United States is sold and the Lasky organization starts under the most favorable of circumstances.

Edwin Milton Royle, who has been on the coast aiding in the production of his famous drama, returned to New York last week, enthusiastic over the outlook. He is so deeply impressed with motion picture futures that he has almost decided to abandon playwriting in favor of picture scenarios.

VENTILATION DATA—A USEFUL BOOK.

The B. F. Sturtevant Company, Hyde Park, Boston, Mass., has submitted a copy of what appears to be an excellent and useful work on ventilation which will really fill a long felt want.

This work contains 323 pages, aside from the index. It is 6½ x 9 inches in size; substantially bound in cloth, profusely illustrated and well printed. The text matter goes into both the theoretical and practical side of ventilation very thoroughly and, inasmuch as the Sturtevant Company has long been engaged in the business of manufacturing high class ventilation apparatus, and has therefore made an extended study of the theoretical and practical sides of all matters pertaining to ventilation, the book may be considered as being authoritative. There are tables, numerous diagrams, and, taken altogether, the work is such that it can be consistently recommended to theater managers.

The Sturtevant Company asks us to say that, owing to the size and cost of the work it cannot be distributed gratis, though only a comparatively small charge of $1.00 per copy will be made to cover postage, etc.

MIGNON TAKES CHANCES AGAIN.

Since Mignon Anderson hasn't had to put her young life in peril since she raced an auto against a train in "The Plot Against the Governor," she registered a huge kick with the Thanhouser directors last week, resulting in her being told to jump from a window for a new drama called "An Elusive Diamond." Here's what Mignon performed: Leaped from a second story window and grabbed to the bough of a tree on the way down. Here the weight of her own body determined the finale. It bore the bough to a distance so near the ground that Miss Anderson was enabled to spring off in safety! Sounds like "press stuff," of course. Then see the picture on its release, January 23rd, and guess again.

"JUST KIDS" (Eclair).

A beautiful play enacted entirely by child artists. A little boy in his dreams elopes with his sweetheart, goes west, becomes rich, kills the villain and lives happy ever afterward. It is the sweetest and most appealing story ever told in pictures and will amuse the "Kiddies" and immensely please their elders. To be released January 28.

Sebastian and Allen, Famous Vaudeville Team, Pose for Special Dance Feature.

Today, when everyone from the office boy to the leading society belle, is striving to master the latest tangos and turkey trots that have swung into such extreme popularity, when the press is devoting columns in every issue to various important personages' expressions who either applaud or condemn the airy dances, such a feature as this should be greeted with unusual enthusiasm by the exhibitor and his patron.

The Universal Film Manufacturing Company secured the services of Sebastian and Allen, the favorites of the smart set in New York, to pose for a set of the world famous modern dances. The artists have been brought close up to the camera in order that every movement might be plainly distinguished by the spectator; that the spectator might be able to fasten the various movements in the mind's eye.

Mr. Sebastian is such a favorite with the society people in the East that he receives not less than $50 an hour from patrons who are desirous of learning the steps of the newest dance creations. He is a big drawing card at the Jardin de Dance, New York, and hundreds of New Yorkers visit this place every night to see the graceful movements as executed by him and his partner, Miss Allen, in the following dances: The Modern Turkey Trot, the Hesitation Waltz, the Maxixe Brazilian, the Sebastian Maxixe, the Sebastian Tango.

This exhibition of modern dancing will be released under the Victor brand January 26th.

BALBOA COMPANY INCREASING PLANT.

One of the largest studio stages to be found in California has recently been erected in the extension of the Balboa Amusement Producing Company's studios at Long Beach, California, the stage being fifty feet wide and one hundred and twenty feet deep. This will permit of the staging of big scenes of feature pictures to comprise six to eight reels of film.

A third dramatic company has been added to the forces of the concern and President H. M. Horkheimer has had a model studio erected for the addition to his former plant.

Assistant General Manager Arthur A. Lotto, of the Balboa Company, will shortly accompany President H. M. Horkheimer on a tour of the United States and Canada, for the purpose of establishing exchanges to handle their products. Negotiations are now pending for the opening of branch offices in the principal cities of Europe for the same purpose.

AM. THEATER CURTAIN & SUPPLY CO. MOVES.

The head offices of the American Theater Curtain and Supply Company, in St. Louis, have moved from Main Street and are now located on the second and third floors of the Nulsen Building, Sixth and Olive Streets. In addition to their well known radium gold fibre screens, they are opening sales rooms for handling a full line of the highest class of supplies manufactured in this country for picture theater equipment. They are also arranging for immediate enlargement of offices in Pittsburgh and New York City, where they have representatives at present for the radium screens only.

GREAT OAKS FROM LITTLE ACORNS GROW.

In one year's time, a young New York man had sown his acorns so successfully that the small concern which he had started was increased to a capitalization of one hundred thousand dollars, and is now incorporated under the name of the Life Photo Film Corporation. Edward M. Roskam, the young man, is president of the concern, and Bernard Loewenthal is the treasurer.

Beginning with a camera only, the company now has a thoroughly equipped laboratory that is turning out an average of two hundred thousand feet of film per week, have branched out, and are building a modern and perfectly equipped studio to be run in conjunction with their laboratories. Nothing but the best comedies, dramas and tragedies will be leased by this company.

"IN THE FALL OF '64" (Gold Seal).

In 1864 the South knew that their cause was lost—knew that they were fighting a losing battle and yet they rallied time and again and fought on with a fierceness that caused the whole world to wonder and respect.

Grace Cunard took this period of the Civil War history for her present intensely interesting drama. With a wonderful reflection of youthful vivacity Miss Cunard also enacts the role of Virginia, a Southern lass whose ready nerve and alert wit swings the tide to the Confederacy for the moment. With her, playing the dashing young Southern officer, is Mr. Ford, also the director of the pictures. Both the hero and heroine belong and fight for the same cause. The old triangle is lacking.

INCE TO MAKE JAPANESE PICTURE.

Thomas H. Ince, managing director of the New York Motion Picture Corporation, recently signed for a series of photoplays Miss Tsuru Aoki and her company of Japanese players, the only ones in motion pictures to-day.

It so happens that Miss Aoki is a native of the Island of Sakura, which was practically destroyed by the eruption of the volcano Sakura-Jaima. Miss Aoki, having lost practically all her relatives in this eruption, was inconsolable and Mr. Ince thought that he was due to lose her, that she would have to go back home. But in consoling her, he induced her to work in conjunction with him on a thrilling and powerful heart interest story, entitled "The Wrath of the Gods," a four reel Domino feature, evolving around Japanese legends and depicting the scenes and actions of her countrymen during the eruption, so that she could show the world the sufferings of her people.

Mr. Ince had built in the Santa Monica Canyon a whole Japanese village. The entire Japanese company of twenty people are being used in this. In addition to this Mr. Ince is scouring the lower part of California for Japanese laborers, which are to be worked in as peasants in the picture. The finish of the picture is to show the volcano in eruption and the molten lava destroying the Japanese village.

The wonder clock, as it is styled by the General Sales Company of America, with offices in Pittsburgh, has lately been installed in several theaters in its vicinity. The dial can be read from all parts of any house and, apart from its usefulness, causes considerable conjecture in any audience as to the working arrangement of the device.

"TREASURES ON EARTH" (Lubin).

This is a very dramatic story written by a very eminent author, Mr. Clay M. Greene. The star character is not an unusual type of man, but one who loses all friends and all happiness in life through his inordinate passion for making and hoarding money, in short a miser and money grubber. In the photoplay the distinguished author has played the ungrateful role himself and given a characterization that will be long remembered. The supporting cast is selected from one of the best companies of the Lubin studio.

Scene from "Treasures on Earth" (Lubin).

Mark Dow, a money lender, by selling a property, becomes possessed of $150,000. The money stimulates his greed for gold and he becomes so miserly that his wife and boy are denied the necessities of life. This causes a quarrel and the wife takes her boy and leaves the home. Dow does not take the matter very seriously consoling himself that they will soon return. Years pass and Dow, changing his name to Dowling, goes to Philadelphia and investing in an oil refinery becomes president. Mrs. Dow has a hard battle to live and eventually William, now a young man takes a job in the refinery, not knowing that his father is the principal owner. In the boarding house where the mother and boy live, there also lives pretty Grace Roth, who is a stenographer in Dowling's office. William and the girl fall in love, but as the mother is in bad health they fear to undertake the responsibilities of marrying. The doctor tells them that, to save her life, Mrs. Dow must be sent to Arizona and William in desperation goes to Dowling and demands the loan of $500. When he signs the note Dowling realizes that it is his own son; he destroys the paper and gives him $1000. Simultaneously the plant takes fire and William saves his father and a little girl who is in the room. Next day the family go to see the ruins and they are reunited with promise of a happier future.

DOINGS AT WARNER'S.

A. Warner, accompanied by Mrs. Warner, sailed on the Kronprinzessin Cecile, Tuesday for London, where he will study the feature market. Incidentally, it is rumored about West 46th street, that he is likely to return with some big things in his valise. Mr. Warner's popularity was shown by a delightful supper party accorded him at the Knickerbocker on the eve of his departure by his friends and associates. If his English co-workers receive him with any more spirit than his followers on this side wished him bon-voyage, we question his vanity.

H. M. Goetz, from his reports on his Pacific Coast trip, is doing a land office business. If he was a native son we would question these, but not being a Californian we are further assured of his integrity by the certified slips that come with his messages.

You hear a lot about local color in the film business, but here's some real stuff. Miss Gene Gauntier and her company are planning a trip into the heart of the Katahdin country in Maine to stage some stories with the real lumber country as a background. This is getting the "reel" stuff on the screen. And we know with her artistic producing methods we will have some features that will be winners.

New Orleans is now to be managed by F. B. Dexter.

A new-comer in the picture game is Jack Eaton, an advertising man of Philadelphia. He has hitched up with Johnson to handle publicity.

LONGFELLOW'S "EVANGELINE" IN PICTURES.

Canadian Bioscope Company, Limited, to Show a Five-Reel Subject Photographed on Historic Spots.

H. T. Oliver, vice-president and general manager of the Canadian Bioscope Company, Limited, announces that the five-reel production of "Evangeline" will be shown for review next week. The story follows the poem of Longfellow, being supplemented in instances by data gathered from other sources and was photographed in the "land of Acadie." Mr. Oliver is modest in his claims, but acknowledges he thinks he has a beautiful picture. The subject was staged by E. P. Sullivan and W. H. Cavanaugh, formerly of the Reliance and Pathe companies respectively, both men well known to picture followers. The stockholders of the Canadian Bioscope Company are capitalists of Halifax and one or two other Nova Scotian towns. The officers other than Mr. Oliver are H. H. B. Holland, president; John Strachan, treasurer, and T. P. Payne, secretary. "Evangeline" will be marketed in the United States on the states' right plan, and in Canada by means of the booking system. No arrangements have yet been made as to the disposal of the English and other foreign rights, although there have been many inquiries.

There are other subjects in preparation, including a Northwestern classic, an English production and also an elaborate picture based on Eastern Canadian history.

THE CELEBRATED PLAYERS FILM CO.

The Celebrated Players Film Company, of Chicago, is a young and thriving organization which has Alfred Hamburger, a daring photoplay exhibitor, as its president and treasurer. This concern is releasing one big feature each week in its territory of Illinois, Wisconsin and Indiana. It controls all the Bosworth films of Jack London's novels, as well as the Paul J. Rainey African Hunt pictures, the "Vicar of Wakefield," "East Lynne," "The Battle of Waterloo," and the Richard Wagner pictures.

Luxurious offices have been secured on the ninth floor of the Garrick Theater Building. H. A. Spanuth, general manager of the organization, is one of the best known picture men in the country. He was formerly prominently connected with the feature department of the General Film Company, in New York City.

The Ziegfeld picture playhouse, on Michigan Boulevard, a $2.00 theater, has been dedicated exclusively to high class photoplays at 25 cents admission. The opening took place Saturday, January 3, with a large attendance. The attraction was the life drama of Richard Wagner. The announcement of the initial performance was made in a full page advertisement in the Chicago Tribune.

The Celebrated Players Film Company is searching the American and European market for the highest class of feature productions made, and there is no proposition, according to Alfred Hamburger, which is too big or too costly for consideration.

KERRY HALED TO A DINNER.

William H. Kerry, the purchasing agent of the Lubin Film Company, was, last week, treated to a big surprise. A friend, Thomas Quirk, called Bill up on the phone and requested him to come forthwith to his house on a matter of importance. Kerry hastened to his friend, and before greetings were fairly spoken, a police Lieutenant and Kerry's wife entered the room. Mrs. Kerry pointed out her husband and the officer quickly placed the irons on his wrists. Kerry demanded explanation and was told that all would be explained later. With this he was rushed out to an automobile and quickly driven to Becker's Cafe, Frankford, Philadelphia. The handcuffs were removed and Kerry was ordered to take a chair at the head of a well appointed table. The toastmaster then explained that he was the guest of honor at a little banquet arranged by his friends, which included Senator Jas. T. Nulty, Congressman Michael Donohoe, Dr. John J. Lynch, Chas. J. McKinney, Edw. J. Owens, John A. Quinn, Thomas J. Eagan, Daniel G. O'Keefe, John B. Vincent, Jos. J. Toland, Jas. Adamson, Frank J. Lynch, John D. Halligan, Edw. F. Shields, and Thomas K. Quirk.

LADIES' WORLD HERO CONTEST.

The publishers of The Ladies' World announce very satisfactory results from the "hero" contest, now running in that magazine. The particulars of this contest have been published in The Moving Picture World in a previous issue. Seven contestants are in the race and the standing of the contestants up to Jan. 19, are as follows:

J. Warren Kerrigan, 104,180; Crane Wilbur, 99,190; Maurice Costello, 96,820; Francis X. Bushman, 94,810; Arthur Johnson, 51,130; King Baggot, 45,960; Carlyle Blackwell, 29,340. The total number of votes cast is 522,430.

ANGLO-AMERICAN FILM CORPORATION.

Promoted by Edward Laurillard, of London, and George W. Lederer, of New York—Has Variety of Original Ideas.

In the formal announcement of the debut of the Anglo-American Film Corporation, which appears elsewhere in this issue of the Moving Picture World, appear the names of Edward Laurillard, of London, and George W. Lederer, of New York, who are the chief sponsers of the new company. Mr. Laurillard is the proprietor and manager of the handsome New Gallery Kinema picture theater of London and also in sole control of sixteen other theaters in London. Mr. Lederer has been connected with theatrical affairs in New York and Chicago in a prominent way for nearly twenty years and is well known to theater goers on both sides of the Atlantic. He has the director general for the Anglo-American concern, with Mr. Laurillard as resident director in London.

The Anglo-American Corporation has been formed, primarily, to handle "The Three Musketeers" and "Sixty Years a Queen." The first subject was produced by a company of French actors from the story of Dumas; the second is a well portrayed series of events during the career of Queen Victoria and is a most impressive production. Both productions have been executed upon elaborate lines involving the expenditure of large sums of money and the employment of many people and horses.

It is with these worthy examples of motion picture art that the Anglo-American Film Corporation makes its bow to the public, giving further assurance that it will offer in future, in its appointed work as an international clearing house, only the best output of every nation and a service that will please producers and exhibitors alike. With Mr. Laurillard in London and Mr. Lederer in New York it is proposed to procure for the Anglo-American the best product of both continents.

A further enterprise in which the new corporation will engage will be the exhibition of pictures in some Broadway house, which will be patterned after the London Kinema in decoration and conduct.

PRIZE OFFERED FOR SCENARIOS.

Owing to the scarcity of good material for motion picture scenarios, the Balboa Amusement Producing Co., 806 Security Building, Los Angeles, California, will offer a prize of two hundred dollars for the best three-reel scenario for a drama, submitted before May first.

The competition is an open one and not only will afford the opportunity of a writer winning the two hundred dollar prize, but will also enable writers to sell scenarios which may not come up to the standard set for the prize-winning one, as the Balboa Company will offer the market price of twenty-five dollars per scenario reel for such scenarios as may be acceptable to them.

NEW GLORIA STUDIO.

A new studio has just been finished by the Gloria Company on the Riviera. It is situated on the sea cliffs, amid an abundance of natural scenery. There it will be possible to get the tropical and ocean scenes at any time of the year; while in the home studio, at Torino, winter scenes can be had at all times, with the Alps as a background. In equipment these two studios are excelled by none. Their size may be judged by some of the settings in the Gloria Company's latest production "Love Everlasting." Under the famous producer Mario Caserini, they are now producing some elaborate subjects which will soon be released in this country.

NEW VOLUME ABOUT MOVING PICTURES.

Robert Grau, who has already had published three voluminous works on the stage and its people, has decided to devote the fourth and final volume of the series to the evolution of the motion picture. Mr. Grau's new volume is entitled "The Theater of Science," and deals with the film industry from all its angles. The new book will contain five hundred pages of text and over four hundred illustrations. Over two hundred public libraries have ordered the work in the past few weeks.

GOVERNOR TAYLOR'S INAUGURATION FILMED.

The Commercial Motion Pictures Company had a cameraman on hand at the inauguration of James H. Fielder, the new governor of New Jersey. The ceremony took place in Trenton on Tuesday, January 20. The Commercial M. P. Co. had the exclusive cinematographic rights for this occasion. These pictures will, no doubt, be a big drawing-card in New Jersey, and several large theaters in the state had already contracted for early dates before the film was made.

MARY PICKFORD IN A NEW ROLE.

Mary Pickford, the celebrated film favorite, makes her reappearance in the productions of the Famous Players in "Hearts Adrift," a tragic epic of the deep, to be released February 10th. The story is a romance of tangled lives, interwoven with the mist of the sea.

Mary Pickford portrays the role of Nina, a little Spanish girl, who is washed ashore on the beach of an uninhabited South Sea Island, the sole survivor of a shipwreck. The little one leads a primitive life on the desolate island, subsisting on fruit, fish and herbs. She makes friends and companions of the birds and beasts of the island, and contrives crude garments from skins and fibre. She is just budding into womanhood, when another castaway is sent by fate to share the wild life of the island with her. The newcomer is Jack Graham, who separated from his wife when their yacht burns near the isolated island. The solitude of the island has wrought the fear of man in Nina's heart, and, when she discovers Graham's figure, timidly runs away. Later her fear disappears, and she permits him to approach. They become friends, and gradually their intimacy ripens into love. Realizing that their lives cannot continue in this manner, Graham performs an impromptu marriage ceremony, making her repeat the formula of the ritual after him. At times, when the vision of his wife comes between himself and Nina, Graham is remorseful, but his regrets are dissipated in his love for Nina and the little baby that comes to them. Nina is supremely happy, but one day a boat comes to the lonely island. In it is Mrs. Graham, who for years has sought her husband. In the joyful reunion of wife and husband, Nina is completely forgotten. But the little Spanish girl sees and understands all. A moment later the happy couple see her poised on the brow of a cliff, her babe in her arms. Only a moment she stands there, and then leaps to death, thus absolving Graham from his duty to her.

The pathos of this drama is softened by Miss Pickford's charming and piquant portrayal of the role of the little half-savage Nina. At frequent periods in the story Miss Pickford attains high dramatic power, and strikes a distinct note in her delicate rendition of her supreme sacrifice of self for love.

"Hearts Adrift" is the first of the Famous Players productions to be made at the Los Angeles studio, and was produced under the direction of Edwin S. Porter.

MANUEL KLEIN WRITES MUSIC FOR ALL-STAR.

Beginning with its latest and current release, the six-part production of Richard Harding Davis' great play and story, "Soldiers of Fortune," the All-Star Feature Corporation will issue an especially written musical score for this production.

Manuel Klein, composer and musical director of the New York Hippodrome, whose musical works are known the world over, has been commissioned by the All-Star company and in addition to his present score, will write incidental music to all of that company's releases in the future.

The success of the "Soldiers of Fortune" score is well attested to by the eagerness with which both state rights buyers and theater proprietors have accepted it.

KALEM TO RE-ISSUE "THE COLLEEN BAWN."

Exhibitors who recall the record-breaking success of Kalem's three-part photoplay adaptation of Dion Boucicault's immortal drama of Irish life "The Colleen Bawn," will hail with delight the announcement that this extraordinary production is to be re-issued.

This decision comes as the result of the numerous requests that have poured in upon the Kalem Company in the past few years. The unprecedented popularity of the famous Irish drama and the business that resulted wherever it was shown, created a natural desire upon the part of the exhibitors that this feature be re-issued.

"The Colleen Bawn" was first released October 20th, 1911. It met with instantaneous success—a success so great that many theaters booked it for three return engagements without the slightest diminution in business.

The remarkable hold which "The Colleen Bawn" has upon the public is, in a large measure, due to the wonderful insight it gives to Irish life and to the powerful story it tells. Probably no other playwright has ever equalled Dion Boucicault in depicting Ireland's sons and daughters.

"The Colleen Bawn" will be released March 16th, in time for St. Patrick's Day. Exhibitors would do well, therefore, to make immediate arrangements with their exchanges for this feature.

MAINE EXHIBITORS TO CONVENE FEBRUARY 3.

President Moxley Blumenberg wishes to personally ask the attendance of all Maine exhibitors, as he has every reason to believe that a most important meeting will be held. The branch is in a most flourishing condition, and is gaining in strength and numbers.

CHOUINARD TRAVELING FOR ERNEMANN.

Dealers in and those using cameras and laboratory goods west of the Mississippi may expect a visit soon from Oscar Chouinard who has just been engaged by the Ernemann Photo-Kino Works, of New York, to cover the western territory. He is fortunate in having as his principal line such well known articles as the Ernemann camera, models "A" and "B," and the Ernemann "Imperator" film printing machine.

ROTHAPFEL WILL SAIL.

It was erroneously announced in last week's paper that S. L. Rothapfel, manager of the Regent Theater, 116th Street and Seventh Avenue, New York City, had sailed for Europe. It is the intention of Mr. Rothapfel to leave these shores in the early part of February.

CORRESPONDENCE

NORTH WESTERN NEW YORK.

OWING to a smallpox scare, the International Theater, Niagara Falls, was closed recently for a week.

After serving as a theater for forty years, the Hodge Opera House, of Lockport, is being turned into business offices.

Harry B. Hearn is the new manager of the Shubert Theater, Rochester, N. Y. This house, which had featured dramas for years, now plays vaudeville and moving pictures. Two performances are given daily. The theater is operated by F. Ray Comstock and Edgar Allen, of New York, and their associates. Mr. Hearn, new resident manager, has successfully conducted vaudeville houses in Washington, D. C., Richmond, Norfolk, Charlestown, Altoona and Albany.

Moving pictures will occasionally form the programs at the New Gayety, a burlesque house, which has been opened here recently under the management of J. M. Ward.

The Buffalo Times recently used an interesting story of Walter H. Foster, manager of the Family Moving Picture Theater, Buffalo. His picture accompanied the write-up. The writer says that Mr. Foster, and his partner, Mr. Morati, appeared several years ago in illustrated songs. Later he was with the Dot Karrol Repertoire Company as a lead act. He again featured illustrated songs. An excerpt from the write-up follows: "In 1902 and 1903, when he ran concerts in Providence Theater, Providence, R. I., he turned over a neat sum of $52,000 to the Pin Ridge Camp for consumptives. About ten years ago he exhibited feature moving pictures in every Masonic temple, prison and asylum in the state of Massachusetts. The films all were of educational character. On January 1, 1903, he gave a private exhibition of his exclusive films in the residence of Thomas Lawson, famous financier. On October 26, 1904, he formally opened the Masonic Temple, of Providence, with motion pictures." A story covering Mr. Foster's recent activity in the moving picture business has already appeared in this column.

Kinemacolor is being featured in the Gordon Moving Picture Theater, Rochester.

"Quincy Adams Sawyer" in moving pictures was a recent attraction at Fitzhugh Hall, Rochester.

William F. Sullivan, formerly of Shea's Theater, has become treasurer of the New Gayety.

The Musicians' Association of Buffalo has elected Herman E. Schultz, a member of its executive committee. Mr. Schultz is leader of Shea's orchestra.

The Lafayette Theater, Buffalo, which formerly played burlesque, is being remodeled and about March 1 will be opened as the Olympic Theater. It is said that upward of $75,000 is being spent on the building. The house will be conducted by the Olympic Amusement Company, of which M. Slotkin, a prominent merchant and theatrical man, is general manager. Vaudeville and moving pictures will be presented at popular prices. Modern facilities for ventilation and lighting will be installed. The floor will be lowered to the street level. The balcony will be supported by great steel girders, an unobstructed view of the stage being given from every part of the house. Provision is being made for a large lobby and foyer, wide aisles and comfortable seats. There will be a rest room for women and a smoking room for men.

In connection with the effort of Rochester, N. Y., moving picture men to open their shows on Sunday, Bishop Hickey, of that city, has expressed his opposition to the plan as follows: "I do not believe in legalizing an open Sunday, or in any way encouraging a movement to carry on business interests on the Lord's day. We have a happy condition here in Rochester just now, and it seems to me that it would be nothing less than a step backward, contrary to the best interests of the public at large, as well as to the private individual, and that we ought to keep all business activity and interests of a purely business character out of the lives of Rochester citizens on that one day of the week."

Emphatic protests have been made by the managers of Toronto, Ont., theaters against the claims of the Civic Survey Committee of that city that the playhouses there are not adequately protected against fire and panic. The managers claim that they can empty their houses in five minutes by means of fire escapes. They say their theaters are perfectly equipped in the matter of fire protection.

"Quo Vadis?" proved a popular attraction recently at Fitzhugh Hall, in Rochester. There was special music written by Dr. Gustave Ronfort.

Buffalonians were loud in their praises of "Antony and Cleopatra," George Kleine's great moving picture, recently presented at the Majestic Theater for a week. Foster Moore, Buffalo manager of the George Kleine attractions, left nothing undone in the way of publicity to exploit the engagement here, and packed houses were the recompense for his efforts. Large advertisements about the show were carried in the Buffalo newspapers and these were backed by many columns of reading notices. The billboard and other advertising was dignified but especially effective. Edward J. Scanlon, regular press agent for the Majestic, co-operated with Mr. Moore in booming the production. Manager John Laughlin, of that theater, was delighted with the attendance and the high quality of the picture. Even the great success of "Quo Vadis?" at his house last summer was eclipsed by that of "Antony and Cleopatra." To permit this presentation for an entire week a regular dramatic production was canceled by Mr. Laughlin.

BILLY BISON.

NEW ENGLAND AND CANADA.

BOSTON is to have an Exhibitors' Ball. The date set for this affair is February 17, and Symphony Hall, Boston, has been selected as the right place to hold it. This decision was only arrived at on January 9, so that complete details have not yet been made, but the various exchanges, both regular and feature, have promised to help in every possible way.

Beginning at midnight, Wednesday, January 7, after the theaters had closed, the meeting of the Moving Picture Operators' Union, Boston Local 182, for the election of officers, continued in session until 7 o'clock Thursday morning. The election tellers did not complete the count of the ballots until Thursday afternoon, and, by that time, most of the members had returned to work in the various theaters. Nathaniel Max was elected vice-president, and Charles Heath the recording secretary. The main contests were for those offices. President Wwight C. Hutchings was re-elected for a second year, as was Business Agent William Franke, for the third time. Treasurer Thaddeus C. Barrows and Financial Secretary Harry Danto were re-elected for third terms. Because of the greatly increased duties of Business Agent Franke, it was voted that Financial Secretary, Harry Danto, should take charge of a part of the work of that office. Fred. J. Kneeland addressed the meeting on license and regulation laws. The local decided that a special legislative committee should look out for the operators' interests in connection with the license law, and other matters affecting them that may come up on Beacon Hill this year. Agent Franke, Treasurer Barrows and John F. Williams were elected to serve on this committee. Plans were completed for the absolute unionization of all houses within a reasonable distance of Boston. The committee which, with officers of the Boston Central Labor Union, has been conferring with the School Committee on conditions for school work, reported. Also a committee on the application of the proposed Chamber of Commerce Fire Prevention and Protection bill to the operating work. The union will not oppose this bill. Other officers elected were: Edward Magann, trustee; Alvin MacKenzie, sergeant-at-arms; President Hutchings, Vice-President Max, Secs. Danto and Heath, Treasurer Barrows, Agent Franke, Trustee Magann, and Sergeant-at-Arms MacKenzie as the executive board. President Hutchings, Vice-President Max, Secs. Danto and Heath, Treasurer Barrows, Agent Franke, William Benoit, Frank Hookailo, and Edward McCabe were elected as delegates to the Boston Central Labor Union. The intense interest shown at this election, together with the spirited competition for election to the various offices, is proof positive of the extremely flourishing condition of Local 182.

Phil Gleichman, vice-president and general manager of the World Special Films Corporation, paid a flying visit to Boston on January 9, to visit H. Hirsch, the manager of the New England branch, with headquarters at 1074 Boylston street. Mr. Gleichman was greatly elated with the progress made in this territory by Mr. Hirsch, and stated that he finds it necessary to move his Boston office to larger and more conveniently located headquarters in the downtown district.

Ten Victoria Street, Montreal, is the location of the new Independent Feature Film Company, which has made arrangements to exploit a line of feature films in Canada. Mr. Kashin has been retained as general manager. Mr. Kashin is a former exhibitor of experience, and has already purchased a number of feature productions in New York, among which are "Over Niagara Falls," in four reels, and "The Girl of the Sunny South," in five reels.

The Echo Feature Film Company, 835 Broadway, New York, has purchased "The Lure of New York," a four-reel feature made by the New York Film Company, for New England.

Buck Stein, well known to film men hereabouts, is now manager of the newly incorporated Allen Feature Film Corporation, with offices at 88 Boylston street, Boston. Mr. Allen is an exhibitor from Providence, R. I., and says his concern will produce, lease and rent features.

A new incorporation is the Lyric Theater and Amusement Company, of Lynn, Mass. John B. Vitale, Joseph Garrison, and Fred Moore are the promoters. The capital is named at $10,000.

Toomey and Demara state that it is their intention, at the close of the present season, to tear down their new Nickel Theater, Lawrence, Mass., to take the entire structure and lot, which they own, and to remodel and reconstruct it by building a new $200,000 theater, with a seating capacity of over 3,000. The new house is to have all the latest and most modern equipment, including escalators to the balconies, a $20,000 organ, and other features. The new theater will be one the largest, most modern and thoroughly fireproof houses in New England. This information was delivered by Mr. Toomey, at the seventh annual banquet tendered by the firm to the employees of their various theaters, on Christmas night, at Libby Hall, Lawrence. The employees presented Mr. Toomey with a silver shaving set and Mr. Demara was similarly favored. Manager Oldfield was presented with a purse of gold, while Managers James Toomey, of the Premier Theater, and Maguire, of the Broadway Theater, were presented with umbrellas. The entire banquet and dance was a huge success.

Jules Bernstein is to manage Marcus Loew's new theater at Toronto, Canada, according to report, as Eugene Meyers has returned to New York to take charge of the new Orpheum Theater.

Moxley C. Blumenberg reopened his New Portland Theater, Portland, Maine, on January 5, after a week devoted to renovations. A new ground floor, lobby and ticket booth of marble were installed during that time. The house is now in first class shape, and presents a cosmopolitan appearance, with a liberal supply of tungsten lights in the front and lobby. Mr. Blumenberg has now reverted to the former policy of vaudeville and photoplays, and business is excellent.

James W. Greely, manager of Greely's Theater, at Portland, Maine, is doing his usual good business with vaudeville and pictures. The Casco Theater, of this city, is now under Mr. Greely's direction. The Casco is to remain closed for about two weeks, during which time it will be greatly improved by reason of extensive alterations. A. J. Wildes has been selected by Mr. Greely as his assistant for the Casco, which is due to reopen on January 19, with feature photoplays and the Bay State Ladies' Orchestra. Feature musical acts are to be presented off and on.

Manager William E. Reeves, of the Big Nickel Theater, Portland, Maine, offered the Famous Players' production "A Lady of Quality," this week, to big returns.

General Film service is doing very well by the Empire Theater, Portland, Maine, which is in charge of D. D. Leader as local manager.

Lindsay Morrison is no longer connected with the Lynn Theater, Lynn, Mass., and a persistent rumor is about to the effect that this house will soon be the latest addition to the Marcus Loew chain of theaters, offering vaudeville and pictures.

The stock company attractions which have held forth at Gordon's Theater, Chelsea, Mass., were discontinued on January 3. Pictures are to be installed instead.

J. W. Mitchell has opened a new moving picture theater at South Norwalk, Conn. The house is a small one, of the store-show variety.

F. C. Spencer, owner of the Lyric Theater, St. John, Canada, was presented with a beautiful silver tea urn by the employees. Gilmour Armstrong, of the Lyric, received a shaving set. Mr. Spencer remembered his staff with goldpieces. The employees of the Empress Theater, this city, presented W. C. Smith, the manager, with a dressing-case. Manager F. H. Trifts, of the Gem Theater, also at St. John, was presented with a brass desk set, with fittings, and a silver chafing dish. Manager Trifts handed out goldpieces to his employees.

"Arizona," the six-reel feature was offered at the Francais Theater this week, by Manager Ken. E. Finlay. This Ottawa, Canada, house is doing very well.

The Grand Theater, Brantford, Canada, is using Edison's talking pictures to good effect. The Colonial, Gem, and Apollo theaters are all getting good trade.

Manager H. A. Chenoveth, of the Shawmut Theater, Boston, celebrated Anniversary Week by offering an unusually big bill of General Film service and vaudeville.

Poli's Palace Theater, Springfield, Mass., has inaugurated Sunday shows of vaudeville and photoplays. The first show was given December 28, and results thus far are most pleasing. Walter Griffin, formerly assistant manager of Poli's, has been selected to take complete charge of the Sunday shows over the Poli circuit.

William B. Nelson is now in charge of the Ideal Theater, a photoplay house at Milford, Mass. The Ideal has changed hands, and Manager F. T. Ray is no longer connected with it.

Nicholas Young dramatic critic of the Boston American, in a signed article, appearing January 11, has many good things to say of the Universal's "Traffic in Souls." Among which we find: "That so stirring a story should have found its way to a moving picture studio, without having been halted by some regular theatrical producer, carries its own blessings in the shape of lower priced entertainment and wider field of operations. . . . Its appeal is distinctly human. . . . The scenes are astonishing in their vivid presentation. . . . 'Traffic in Souls' is worth seeing." Mr. Crosby, dramatic critic of the Boston Post, also sings the praises of this Universal feature.

H. Hirsch, manager of the New England office of the World Special Films Corporation, with headquarters at 1074 Boylston street, Boston, has returned to the home offices of his concern. This exchange has now been well established and successfully launched, and Mr. Hirsch's services are needed in New York. Fred B. Murphy, formerly manager of the Mutual's branch office at Waterville, Maine, has been secured to succeed Mr. Hirsch.

Crosby B. Thompson, manager of the South End Theater, Boston, has resigned, to take a position in the executive department of the Edison Electric Company, Boston.

Manager Joseph Roth, of the Olympic Theater, Bowdoin Square, Boston, has decided to give features a trial. The Olympic is enjoying a rattling good business, entirely due to Mr. Roth's managerial ability, as, under former management, the Olympic was a failure.

Mayor John F. Fitzgerald, of Boston, has filed a bill in the Massachusetts legislature, to the effect that every ticket of admission to a public amusement shall be revocable if sold at a higher price than that appearing on its face.

Another bill before the present Massachusetts legislative body calls for a statute to the effect that no theater shall sell more tickets than it has seats. This would do away with utilizing the lobby for standing room, and would work a genuine hardship on exhibitors.

Mayor James Chambers, of Everett, Mass., has ideas of his own as to amusements, and has stated he was in favor of a Board of Censors to serve without pay. This board is to be created by ordinance, and its duties shall include the supervision of all the theaters and public dance halls in the city. The board must report to the mayor whenever in its judgment the character of the entertainments furnished, or the methods of conducting the shows are "inimical to the moral welfare of the community." A license to erect another moving picture theater in Everett has been granted, and plans for still another are now in the hands of the Inspector of Buildings. As the reason for creating the Censorship Board, Mayor Chambers states that because of the great increase in the number of requests for permits for entertainments which are under the direct supervision of the mayor, it is impossible for the Executive Department to become familiar with the character of all of them. Messrs. Murphy and Hyde are now building a moving picture theater in Everett, to seat about 800, while Mr. Berman, of Winthrop intends to reconstruct the old Y. M. C. A. building into a photoplay house. Mr. "Nate" Brown manager of the Broadway Theater, Everett, is building up a solid trade by offering the Universal program and vaudeville. "Absinthe," a Universal feature, is scheduled for exhibition by Mr. Brown's theater the first of February.

John D. Ryan, of Holyoke, has presented a bill to the Massachusetts legislature as follows: "All license fees received on Sunday for theatrical entertainments shall be used for charitable purposes."

At a meeting of the New England Association of Railroad Veterans, held in Boston this week, bitter protest against a film now being shown through New England was officially made. The reel, it is claimed, shows railroads and railroad men in a bad and false light. A committee was appointed to investigate, and if possible, to secure the banning of the film from further exhibition. Members who have seen the film said it is calculated not only to promote trouble between the railroads and the public, but between the roads and their employees. They denounced it unqualifiedly. It was stated that the reel showed a tower man, falling asleep at his switch, as a result of which a wreck occurs, and then shows the "faking" of a defense by the railroad to present to the public for the wreck.

The moving pictures of Captain Scott's South Pole expedition will begin an indefinite engagement at Tremont Temple, Boston, on Monday, January 26. The pictures will be projected twice daily, except on Friday nights.

At Tremont Temple, Boston, Burton Holmes is continuing his travel talks on the Philippines, the title of which is "Hiking Through Luzon." These lectures are drawing well, as Mr. Holmes has some unusually interesting motion pictures on which he delivers a lecture.

A call has been issued for a meeting of the Maine State Branch No. 29, of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, to be held at the Falmouth Hotel, Portland, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, Tuesday, February 3. Every member and every exhibitor in the state who is not a member has been urgently requested to attend the meeting, as many matters of vital interest to the exhibitors of Maine will be presented for discussion. President Moxley C. Blumenberg wishes to personally ask the attendance of all Maine exhibitors, and he has every reason to believe that a large meeting will be held, as the branch is in a flourishing condition, and has made real progress in the last few months.

M. C. Blumenberg, manager of the New Portland Theater, Portland, Maine, is doing a capacity business despite the cold weather. The house reopened on January 5, after having been "dark" since December 27, to allow a new lobby and downstairs ticket office, right on the street level, to be installed. Mr. Blumenberg now has a wonderful illumination in his lobby due to 1,000 electric lights. The interior of the house was thoroughly renovated. Five reels of Universal service and three acts of vaudeville is the policy.

Lester E. Adams, electrician and operator of the New Portland Theater, Portland, Maine, is a competent cameraman, as he proved by taking 1,000 feet of motion pictures of the high school students and pupils of the North School, Portland. This topical film drew tremendously well at the New Portland, and was a local sensation.

H. W. Staples has purchased the Kare Killer roller skating rink, at Old Orchard, Maine, and will convert it into a first class picture theater. This will give Old Orchard—a popular summer resort—three picture shows, the Pastime, Kare Killer, and Majestic, in addition to the show on the Pier. It is reported that Proprietor Duffy, of the Pier, will build an open air motion picture theater at the end of the Pier, which is to be used in conjunction with the Pier theater.

The South Portland, Maine, theater, which was recently acquired by Messrs. Littlejohn, is reported as doing a large business with pictures. General Film and Mutual service are used here.

The Star Theater, Westbrook, Maine, has broken all records for business the past month on no less authority than Manager C. H. Prouty. Just at present the Barrett-Brooks stock company is at the Star. The house is very ably managed, and Mr. Prouty is an expert in all matters pertaining to advertising, having formerly been advance man for many large repertoire shows. When General Manager J. A. Eslow, of the New England Universal Film Exchange, offered his beautiful 24-sheet stands free to Universal exhibitors who would guarantee them a 30-day showing, Mr. Prouty immediately asked for a supply, had a large billboard erected, and arranged to have the entire advertisement lighted by electricity.

The first large newspaper advertisement of the Universal's publicity campaign appeared in the Boston American this week. The advertisement was almost a half-page size, and created much attention on the part of the public and the trade.

Roy E. Buzzell, who is at present conducting the Manville, R. I., Opera House, expects to open the New Royal Theater, Wakefield, R. I., very shortly with the Universal program. Mr. Buzzell reports that his Manville house is doing a splendid business.

The new 1,200 seat up-to-date motion picture theater now being built by Green and Allenburg at Malden, Mass., is progressing very nicely. The owners have not yet decided whether they shall operate the theater themselves or lease it. At present the Malden Auditorium, a very large and well equipped house, and a small theater charging five cents admission, have this city to themselves.

S. Z. Poli announces that his Palace Theater, at Springfield, Mass., cleared over $1,500 on its initial performance on December 22. Mr. Poli donated this amount to the local Y. M. C. A. building fund. Manager Gordon Wrighter reports good trade at the Palace, with bills of vaudeville and motion pictures.

The Opera House, Milford, Mass., has changed hands, as Manager Currier and Dr. Cutter sold out their interests. Mr. Willfred Lebesque, of New Bedford, Mass., was the purchaser, and the policy of vaudeville and pictures, with an occasional road show will be continued by the latter, who will manage the Opera House.

The Tripoli Theater, Milford, Mass., is installing a stage and scenery, in order that vaudeville may be added to the picture bills.

Warner's features are the special attractions at the Opera House, Lowell, Mass., of which Will Howe is the manager. Warner's Features are in very brisk demand in New England, and Manager Harry F. Campbell has every reason to be well satisfied with the showing of his office.

"Soldiers of Fortune" turned the trick for Manager W. E. Reeves, of the Big Nickle Theater, at Portland, Maine, this week.

The new Empire Theater, Brantford, Canada, opened on January 5, and every indication points to good business for this new theater. J. Lucas, of New York City, has been retained as manager. Motion pictures are the main attraction. The Empire is modern, well located, and seats about 900.

George F. Law, manager of the Gem Theater, at Brantford, Canada, is remodeling his theater with special reference to the front. Vaudeville and pictures are shown at the Gem.

"Tess of the D'Urbervilles" was featured this week to fine results by Manager Ken Finlay of the Francais Theater, Ottawa, Canada.

Alfred Lake, formerly owner of the Criterion Theater, Toronto, Canada, and Ernest G. Noble, recently associated with the Consolidated Feature Film Company, also at Toronto, are now doing business as feature film renters in Toronto, as Noble and Lake. A branch office is contemplated for Montreal. Mr. Noble has bought many of the best features, and expects to build up a substantial trade.

The Gunnery school, Washington, Conn., has installed an Edison B machine and booth, to show educational films.

George Kleine has opened an office in Boston, to care for the best interests of George Kleine attractions in New England.

William Fox will open a Boston office very shortly, under the name of the Box Office Attractions Film Rental Company, which will handle the features of this concern for New England.

A new and impressive factor was introduced into the feature end of the trade this week, when the United Booking Offices, Boston, decided to break into the renting of feature films, under the name of the United Feature Film Company. Nat. Burgess will pilot this new project, and he promises things on a big scale.

The Ontario Board of Moving Picture Censors has a new plan, which will effect a saving of $2,000, and tend to further prevent "film trickery." At present all films exhibited in Ontario must be preceded by the slogan "Passed by the Ontario Board of Censors." This leader takes about three feet of film, and costs the government about 15 cents. In order to save this cost, which amounts to a considerable figure, due to the large amount of films on the market, the Board has adopted an idea introduced by R. C. Newman, from British Columbia, where he is inspector of moving picture houses. In the future the films will no longer bear the "Passed by the Ontario Board of Censors," leader, but will be stamped with a seal, which can be inspected by police officers.

The Worcester, Mass., Y. M. C. A. has added a course to its educational department—moving picture operating.

The Hamilton, Ontario, school board has passed an order to buy moving pictures suitable for use in connection with the study of geography. Moving picture machines have recently been purchased.

HENRY.

MISSOURI.

J. W. COTTER, formerly of Warner's Kansas City branch, has taken the management of the World's Special Feature Film Company, of Kansas City. The arrangement was made by J. G. Conner, of St. Louis, on a recent visit to the Kansas City branch of the World's Special. A feature of interest is found in the fact that S. J. Berman, until recently manager of the World's Special, has taken Mr. Cotter's old place as manager of the Warner branch. Both managers are well known among Kansas City exhibitors. Mr. Cotter was manager of the Universal exchange in Kansas City until a few months ago, being succeeded at that time by Joseph Spero, the present head of Universal activities in Kansas City.

C. Werner, manager of the Kansas City branch of the American Feature Film Company, will shortly return to St. Louis. His successor in Kansas City has not been definitely determined. Mr. Werner has been in Kansas City for the past eight months.

After spending several months in Texas, E. H. Wachter has joined the Kansas City office of the Mutual Film Corporation as assistant to Manager Paul Englars. Mr. Wachter is unusually well known to exhibitors, having formerly been with the General Film Company in Kansas City. Mr. Wachter assumed his new duties on January 10.

E. H Wiley, president of the Kansas City local of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, and secretary of the National organization, had charge of the presentation of "Les Miserables" at the Grand Avenue Methodist Church recently. The feature was originally scheduled to run but a week, but was so successful under Mr. Wiley's management that it more than tripled that period, netting a good sum for the church. Mr. Wiley will leave for California in the immediate future, the recent engagement having disturbed his plans to make a Western trip in December.

The Hyde Park Theater, which has changed hands several times recently, has been closed. The house is located on Westport Avenue.

The razing of an old building at 1024 Main Street has been begun by Frank L. Newman, who had so much trouble with the Kansas City ordinance providing that no moving picture theaters might be erected within the business district. Leo N. Leslie has charge of the work. He is the owner of the ground on which Shubert's Theater stands. Construction work on the film theater will begin as soon as the old structure is disposed of. Merchants are looking at the activity askance, but as yet have made no further move to prevent work.

A phantom clock utilized by E. E. Richards at the Wonderland Theater, on Twelfth Street, has attracted favorable attention recently The clock is operated by electricity, and is thrown on the wall just adjoining the screen. It brings the time before the audience so vividly that business men can not plead ignorance when they allow a film to keep them from returning to their offices on time.

The annual report of the recreation department of the board of public welfare in Kansas City showed that 15,000 feet of film has been rejected since the censorship was established on October 27. About 185,000 feet of film has been passed on favorably, though objectionable scenes have been eliminated in some instances.

A new angle has been given the advertising of the Mutual Film Corporation recently. Instead of merely advocating Mutual films as the best, the company has hooked up its advertising with the exhibitors who use the service. At the bottom of the ads is a complete list of Mutual exhibitors in Kansas City, Mo., Kansas City, Kan., and in most of the towns of Missouri and Kansas. The public, therefore, in any town in the two States, is able to scan the list and select the nearest house which shows Mutual pictures, should it so desire. The Mutual campaign has been highly successful, according to reports, and the only flaw exhibitors have been able to see in the advertising has been the use of the word "movies." Whether as good results could have been secured by some other slogan is a point of discussion.

Wallace Berry, of the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company, was a recent visitor in Kansas City, where his parents reside, and took advantage of the opportunity to give moving pictures a friendly boost. Mr. Berry lectured at the Apollo Theater, 3227 Troost Avenue, on "Making Moving Pictures." The actor spoke interestingly on the methods of making the film, and devotees of the moving pictures left the theater much enlightened on this score. Mr. Berry was born and raised in Kansas City, and had made a success on the stage before joining the ranks of animated picture actors.

The exhibition department at the Universal's Kansas City office has been completed and daily performances are being given by Manager Joseph Spero. Exhibitors who care to look over the offerings before taking them out of the office are able to do so under the new method.

The Orpheum Theater, Topeka, Kan., has discontinued vaudeville and will depend on animated pictures exclusively for the next few weeks. Whether the house reverts to vaudeville in connection with film depends on how the public receives the pictures, and what kind of arrangements vaudeville booking agents can make, according to an announcement by Manager Henry Gordon. Mr. Gordon made the change because of the poor class of vaudeville given him. When a particularly bad bill was turned over to him, he cancelled his contract and arranged for first-run pictures. Alterations in the theater are being made, but will take place only in the mornings and will not interfere with the regular performances.

Ben Nathanson, proprietor of the Best and Cozy theaters at Topeka, Kan., is planning to erect a vaudeville and moving picture house in that city. The theater will be located at 510 Kansas Avenue, if present plans carry. A seating capacity of 1,500 is planned.

Edison's talking pictures were shown at the Grand Theater, Topeka, Kan., for the first time recently. Big audiences greeted the Kinetophone, which is a novelty 'n the Kansas capital.

The Iris Theater, Topeka, Kan., has made an innovation in favor of female patrons. Morning matinees, as they have been styled, will be features of the Iris policy for an indefinite period. A fashion show in Kinemacolor will be a feature of most of the morning affairs and mere man will be barred from taking in the sights.

MURRAY.

OHIO.

THE motion picture exhibitors of Cleveland take a rosy view of the future. They enter upon the new year expecting better films, better business and better protection from the busybodies whom they say for years have tried to break into the limelight by attacking something. Local men of the industry say that the day is past when "reformers" may gain publicity by finding fault with pictures.

An interview with a number of exhibitors and exchange men, brings out nothing but optimism. J. E. Hennessy, district representative of the Mutual Film Corporation, says: "The best gift that could come to exhibitors of Ohio would be the making permanent of the injunction against the Ohio censors. Exhibitors, as a rule want clean pictures, and few would show anything that was not uplifting and of the proper moral tone, yet they are not in favor of the principle of censorship."

C. M. Christenson, manager of the Mutual exchange, says: "The outlook for the Mutual is great. With the general advertising campaign the Mutual will become the favorite of all the picture-goers. The output is better and general conditions of the industry are the best I have ever known them to be."

C. G. Thompson, manager of Victor Film Service, says: "This will be the best Universal year in the history of this service. We have more famous players and better equipment for making high class pictures than ever before, and this means a good year for the exhibitors who use Universal films."

Manager Goff, General Film Company, says: "The world is awakening to the possibilities of the motion picture. It is just entering into its own as the people's amusement, and during the present year I expect to see a finer production than ever yet has been made. The conditions in the industry grow better each year for the exhibitors, the picture-goer and the film man. The outlook is splendid."

Martin Malaney, Photoplay Advertising and Specialty Company, says: "Just as the films have improved, so has the advertising of them. The posters are as high class as for the best theatrical productions, and the exhibitors will find it easier to do satisfactory business in the year ahead than in any previous year. Pictures must be advertised just as the 'legitimate' show is advertised, with newspaper publicity and good posters."

Louis H. Becht, Mall Theater, says: "The outlook is fine and dandy. Pictures are the greatest entertainment in the world, and every picture is good these days. We never have run bad pictures and never have wanted them. The public is the censor and the film makers are giving the public what it wants."

C. A. McGowan, Cameraphone Theater, says: "There is a great improvement in the pictures, both in scenario and photography, and I expect to see greater improvement during the present year. I see nothing but brightness in the future for the picture man."

There is a new policy regarding the showing of motion pictures at the Miles Theater. Every day the house turns away those who come before the show begins, and as a result, first run photoplays will start at 10.30 o'clock and run until 2 o'clock, when the vaudeville bill begins. Again from 3.30 until 6 o'clock in the afternoon, pictures will be shown. On Sundays, the hours will be as formerly, from 12.30 until 11 o'clock, continuous. This new arrangement of two long programs of films daily gives added opportunity for the picture-goers to visit this new theater. Only first run features are shown at the Miles, the Warner service being used.

The Isis Theater, Superior avenue and East 87th street, Cleveland, reopened recently as The Strand, under the management of David S. Davidson. The theater is one of the largest and best equipped in that part of the city, and Mr. Davidson and associates made extensive improvement after purchasing the property. Mr. Davidson successfully managed the Corona, Prospect avenue, and has recently sold it to out-of-town persons. He is widely known in the picture business and will give the Isis his personal attention. Other practical showmen are said to be associated with him in the enterprise.

Victor O. Woodward, manager of a theater at Sandusky, O., recently was robbed of $550 worth of jewelry, stolen from his suitcase in a Cleveland hotel.

The Lyceum Theater Co., Lima, O., has increased its capital stock from $5,000 to $6,000, in view of recent improvements and business extensions.

The moving picture is soon to be installed as a regular factor of the curative system at Long View asylum, near Cincinnati. It is to be made a sort of "unknown treatment," undergoing which the patient will not realize that he is beoig subjected to a mental test. The patient will see only a pleasant method for his entertainment, when, in reality, an accurate probe into his sick brain will be afforded. Herman T. Goebel, chairman of the board of directors of Long View, is an enthusiastic believer in benefits to be derived from the moving picture, mention of which is made in the annual report just published.

"The audience that views the moving picture shows at Long View," says Goebel, "will be the most interesting in the world. Imagine the situation: an insane man or woman goes into a semi-darkened room. He sees pictures of life before him. He forgets himself. He laughs, still unmindful of his own ailment. His obsessions disappear. He becomes as normal as a child. He goes back to his cot, refreshed and better fitted to fight the disease in his mind."

Censoring of the Long View film will be a delicate duty, Goebel points out. Only the "laughs" will be admitted. No thrilling "cowboy scenes" and no train wrecks or hand to hand battles on the brink. That an insane man's weak point—his line of least resistance—will be in a measure indicated by the film, is Goebel's theory. Thus the moving picture may be utilized as an actual factor in treating the mentally ill.

"The moving picture cannot be installed until the state provides funds for the equipment" says Goebel, "but we think that will be in the near future."

Four permits for new moving picture theaters have been issued in Cleveland in the last six months. The buildings cost $41,000.

An increasing attendance is noted at the Stafford Theater, Niles, O. Lubin and Edison films are shown.

The Broadway Theater, Cleveland, has adopted Mutual films exclusively. Special bills are presented on Sundays.

Twenty-three members of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League No. 7, meeting at Sandusky, recently, re-elected the following officers: President, F. P. Reichert, of Port Clinton; Vice-President, C. F. Steen, of Tiffin; Treasurer, Charles Reark, of Sandusky; Secretary, W. E. Higgins, of Sandusky; Delegates to the State convention at Cincinnati will be selected at a special meeting at Fostoria, January 20.

Employees of the Youngstown Sheet and Tube Co. recently attended a run of the "Safety First" pictures which were shown by H. L. Brownell, who exhibited in Rayen School auditorium, Youngstown.

The Lyric Theater, of Dayton, is giving a shoppers' rebate of five cents to all women attending afternoon shows. The arrangement is by coupons published in the Dayton newspapers.

Emery Downs, manager of the Knickerbocker Theater, Cleveland, offers many innovations in connection with the production of feature films. To prove a theory that feature films can be just as elaborately staged as feature vaudeville acts, Mr. Downs obtained two original pictures recently and to these he added delicately colored curtains and back drops. In the case of "The Princess of Bagdad" the arrangement gave a notable blend of color. In addition the orchestra used more than 100 sheets of cue music, all oriental and in keeping with the picture.

Manager Thomas, of the Grand Theater, Newark, secured "The Adventures of Kathlyn" for presentation in his house, and the first three reels brought out a heavy patronage with a promise of increasing business for the remaining reels in the series.

A building recently leased in the downtown section of Cleveland will be remodeled for use as a motion picture theater. The two-story structure at 423-425 Prospect avenue will be equipped to seat 500. The property was leased for a term of years to Henry D. Scharfield through the office of his brother, M. B. Scharfield. It is expected the theater will be ready for occupancy March 1. In remodeling the building, the theater auditorium is to be given a high ceiling and all materials are to be fireproof. An ornamental structure will replace the present front of the building.

A new house has been added to Cleveland's long list of theaters. David S. Davidson, formerly proprietor of the Corona, Prospect avenue, has purchased the old Isis Theater, at Superior and East 89th street, and will operate it under the name of the Strand Theater. Extensive improvements are to be made on the place.

While on his way to the Hippodrome recently Eddie Foy and his inseparable bull pup entered the Cameraphone Theater, on Euclid avenue, to see the strength of the enemy—the moving picture house. He visited the projecting room and was amazed at the modern high type machines, which, electrically driven, flash pictures across 200 feet of space. "I never knew that pictures could be shown in such a well lit house," he said. "It is certainly wonderful what the past ten years have done for this industry, and the poor vaudeville comedian of the future certainly has my sympathy."

Two transfers of motion picture houses recently took place in Cleveland. Al. Salberg, 527 Schofield building, sold the Monarch, East 105th street and Euclid avenue, to A. B. Goldman, of Youngstown. The Isis, Superior avenue and East 89th street, was sold to the Davidson Amusement Company. The Monarch was built by the Lewis Amusement Company a little more than a year ago and has changed hands twice since. The sale to Goldman was made for L. G. Hoover and I. L. Horn at $18,000.

A new house built by Hart Brothers at Detroit avenue and West 84th street, Cleveland, will be ready for operation soon.

"The moving picture shows have stolen the circuses' thunder. The trouble with the circuses today is that they are just what they were twenty-five years ago. They must be reconstructed if they expect to continue," says Walter L. Main, of Geneva, Ohio, veteran circus owner. Mr. Main has been in business for seven years.

Dr. E. L. Vermilya, health officer at Fremont, Ohio, has ordered the fumigation of all picture houses in that town to eliminate the possible breaking out of an epidemic of scarlet fever that has numbered many victims recently.

In the suit of the Mutual Film Corporation against William C. Norris, at Akron, Ohio, for the recovery of money alleged to be due on a note, the defendant confessed judgment on the note and Common Pleas Judge Doyle gave judgment for $350 and interest.

John C. Graham and George Brown left Cleveland recently for Mexico, with the new telephoto camera of the Kleervue Film Company, to take views of actual battles. President R. J. Morris returned from New York with the new lenses for the camera and tested them from the roof of the Leader-News building. The lenses will permit the taking of engagements three miles distant in the Mexican atmosphere, Mr. Morris says.

Abe Seigel has returned to Cleveland from New York with the prints of the new poemograph subject "Christmas Day in the Workhouse."

BUCKEYE.

PHILADELPHIA.

THE Apollo Theater, the most recent photoplay house to be opened in Philadelphia, located at Fifty-second and Thompson streets, is causing some stir in that section owing to the splendid features which are being shown. As an extra added feature a ten-piece orchestra has been engaged, and the manager, Jack Delmar, promises to give his patrons the very best shows obtainable.

State Fire Marshal Joseph L. Baldwin has called upon the producers of moving picture films and the managers of the photoplay houses to refuse to make or display films which contain views of firebugs at work or which have any suggestions of incendiarism. He says the idea is bad and much care should be shown in excluding such films as those which suggest murder and robbery.

Morris Earle, of Williams, Brown & Earle, 913 Chestnut street, manufacturers of scientific instruments and dealers in motion picture and projection supplies, in speaking of the general business depression, due, or attributed by many business men to the currency bill and the new tariff, said: "I believe the passing of the currency bill will mean better conditions and that business will improve, making 1914 a very good year."

Benjamin Shindler, of the Barrist-Nathan Company, states that his firm is contemplating the selling and leasing of theaters on a scale never before attempted. It is their intention to carry on a theater brokerage business throughout the country. This they intend to accomplish by instituting a national advertising campaign in the leading motion picture and theatrical journals. The firm of Barrist-Nathan Company is well qualified for such an undertaking, being well known to exhibitors everywhere, because of their extensive advertising and the number of years they have been in business. At present they have theaters for rent and sale in over thirty states, most of them requiring little or no capital. It is their boast that few firms have established more ambitious men in any profitable business than they have in the motion picture theater industry.

A large number of the exhibitors attended the private showing of the Lubin feature "The Battle of Shiloh" and "Thor, Lord of the Jungles," made by Selig, which was held at the Regent Theater on Sunday last.

J. H. Norwood, representing George Kleine's attractions, has opened an office at 251 North Thirteenth street.

M. Singer, of the Attractive Features, has moved from the second floor to the first floor of the building at 211 North Thirteenth street.

and give your patrons a real treat. This Selig three-part subject is an exceptional feature.

First of all, it tells a story—a rugged, adventurous, thrilling, pathetic and triumphant story that grips from start to finish. After that comes a high class production—the acting of Kathlyn Williams, greatest of all in her line, the skillful "Selig" manipulation of wild animals, and clear, sharp photography.

CONFIDENCE in the Phantoscope is strengthened if one can have confidence in the experience of those behind it.

Many friends of the Phantoscope know that Mr. C. Francis Jenkins is not only the inventor of the machine, but also that he is the controlling factor in the Phantoscope Manufacturing Company, Washington, D. C., the manufacturers of the Phantoscope.

Mr. Jenkins has been making motion picture machines for twenty-three years; produced the first projecting machine, for which he received a gold medal from the Franklin Institute of Philadelphia.

With this experience behind the Phantascope, is it surprising that the machine is giving such a wonderful account of itself? New principles are employed, and that is why we get such astonishing results—large pictures from standard film with but 3 1-2 amperes of current; a simple and safe machine weighing but eighteen pounds and costing but $75 complete, including cord, screen and carrying case.

I'VE GOT MORE NERVE THAN ANY FIVE MEN IN THE FILM GAME

THAT'S WHAT a FEW BIG DUCKS of the film pond told me when they saw the brand new RUBY TWINPLEX STUDIO. THEY couldn't understand why I didn't try to save about five thousand a year by building it where land is cheap instead of right in the heart of the city.

I'LL SHOW THEM NERVE! I built this big double stage studio, with its stupendous lighting plant, with its thousands of feet of floor space, for a big reason:

I WANT TO HELP THE SMALL MANUFACTURER GET HIS MARKET. TODAY IS HIS DAY. I have in the past hired studios to do my work in, and I know that a REAL one is badly needed. I built this one in order to help the free lance manufacturer make quality goods. I'm going to rent it out right now. The men who are not in any of the film combinations show commendable brain and spunk in their work. They are the boys I'm out to help, and the Ruby Twinplex Studio is ready to receive them.

Come on! The first product of my new home is in six reels—not another word now!

DEACON BILLINGTON'S DOWNFALL (Special—2 parts—Jan. 16).—There was no doubt about it that Deacon Billington was an old pinch penny. He had the reputation of being the meanest man in the county and the county was not particularly famous for its generosity. On account of his meanness, everybody was glad when George Splan's mare beat the deacon's in a trotting race. George and the deacon were not very good friends anyway, because George happened to be in love with the deacon's daughter. His defeat aroused the deacon to such a rage that he positively refused to allow his daughter to have anything more to do with George. The deacon's prohibition did not bother his daughter and George to any alarming extent. They saw about as much of each other as they ever had. The deacon did not notice their disobedience because he himself was in the midst of an exciting romance. Engaged one day in the pursuit of an office boy and a black cat who between them had scattered inky cat tracks over some of his important papers, the deacon had entered the yard of the Widow Divine. His heart was taken captive, and he who came to storm remained to woo. In this tender pastime, he found a dangerous rival in a certain Si Higgins.

The widow listening, as was her custom, to conversation on the telephone one day, heard George and the deacon's daughter planning an elopement. Naturally enough, she told the deacon. The deacon at that time was under a slight cloud. He had been engaged to deliver a temperance lecture, but, on account of the unfortunate discovery of a secret bottle of rum on the part of a tramp which served to apprise the shocked village that it had been sheltering a wolf in sheep's clothing, his moral authority suffered severely. The deacon returned home, and threw Splan out. His utter rage may be imagined when, a few days later, Splan eloped with the girl. The deacon chased them to the parsonage and arrived only to find them married. But what hurt him even more than that was the fact that he also arrived just in time to greet the new Mrs. Higgins, formerly the widow Divine. The deacon stormed and raged until Splan showed him a certain paper the deacon's former office boy had brought him. It dealt with a rather shady mortgage transaction, and on sight of it the deacon subsided immediately. His reputation had suffered too much of late to risk any further blows.

THE LAST SCENE OF ALL (Jan. 17).—For John Arden, the future holds nothing but the promise of dreamless sleep and rest. He is very old and very tired. Because the present is sad and profitless, he seeks the past in his dreams. The link which connected him with his vanished youth is a scrapbook of brown paper. In it Arden had carefully pasted the programs of the plays in which he had won his laurels as an actor. As he sits and muses over the pages, the scene fades and Arden lives again the history of his life. It was in "Richelieu" that he made the first step toward greatness. He was only a minor actor in the company of the great Celia Torrence when suddenly one of the principals was taken ill and Arden was given the part. His success was startling and immediate. The next year Arden's name was mentioned under Celia's in the program heading.

But it did not stop there. As the months went by, Arden's reputation grew mightily until it fairly equaled that of the great Celia. And then, one momentous day, the star came to the theater and discovered that Arden's name was featured on the billboard in larger type than her own. Moreover, when the critics came to call on the actors, Arden was now the center of their attention. A marked coolness sprang up between the two. It was not Arden's fault. In the few years they had played together, he had grown very fond of the beautiful actress. The coolness progressed until at length came the inevitable break.

Arden, broken-hearted, withdrew from the company where his presence was so constant a source of vexation to Celia. Shortly after Arden left, Celia married Granby Phelps, the actor who had taken Arden's place. This was the final blow. Arden threw all his thoughts of future greatness to the winds and allowed himself to drift through life with neither love nor hope. In the last scene of all, we see how in his final delirium, he fancies that he is once again playing in the fight scene of "Richard III," and how he is beaten to the ground by the man who had taken away the only delight of his heart.

OSTRICH FARMING, SOUTH AFRICA (Jan. 19).—Our picture gives a comprehensive and detailed view of an ostrich farm in the natural home of the ostrich, South Africa.

The hen ostrich makes her nest by simply hollowing out a depression in the sand. Under natural conditions, the eggs are hatched out partly by the ostrich and partly by the heat of the sun. On the farm, however, the eggs are removed and placed in an incubator calculated to startle anyone accustomed to the general notion of what an incubator should be.

The life of the young ostrich is followed from the egg to maturity at the age of eight months. At first no larger than an ordinary chicken, the curious bird grows with remarkable rapidity until finally its snake-like head towers far above that of the tallest man.

When the feathers have reached a sufficiently luxurious growth, the ostrich is roped, a hood is placed over his head, and he is led into a stall, where he stands quietly while being divested of his plumage. The process is quite painless, which is the principal reason why ostrich plumes should be worn in preference to such feathers as aigrettes, the procuring of which always means a cruel death to the bird from which they are plucked.

The drying, curling and packing of the feathers are amply illustrated and as a conclusion, some of the magnificent articles which may be made from the plumes are shown.

THE JANITOR'S FLIRTATION (Jan. 19).—The janitor was very unpopular with the boys. He was a singularly neat and orderly sort of person and nothing jarred more forcibly on his methodical soul than the confusion and disorder arising from the consequences of youthful play.

One day, after he had been more than ordinarily unpleasant in his attempts to curb youth as represented by Jimmy Smith, Jimmy decided that something had to be done. Accordingly, in company with his friend, Squatty Hicks, he evolved a dark and desperate plan. Jimmy dressed himself in his sister's clothing—you may be sure Jimmy chose a time when his mother and sister were not at home—and stood on the front steps of the apartment house. Squatty Hicks rushed down to the cellar and informed the janitor that a lady wished to look at an apartment. The gallant janitor came up and courteously escorted the beautiful apparition on the steps to the apartment that happened to be vacant. The young lady expressed herself as highly satisfied with everything. Then to the janitor's pleased amazement, she started to flirt with him. Meanwhile the treacherous Squatty hastened below and informed the janitor's wife that her husband was flirting with a young lady in the vacant apartment. The irate wife ran upstairs in time to catch her perfidious husband in the act of chuckling the fair visitor under the chin.

In the mixup which followed, Jimmy's hat and wig were torn off and the entire state of affairs discovered. He made a wild dash for liberty. The janitor followed. His wife followed the janitor. They all reach the stairs at the same time. The janitor's wife was stout. She slipped on the first step and gathering Jimmy, her husband and several others in her ponderous descent, wedged them all securely in the narrow stairs. It took the combined forces of the police and fire departments to extricate them. What the janitor's wife said and did to her husband immediately thereafter may better be left to the imagination. It is enough to say that Jimmy was perfectly satisfied.

THE MESSAGE OF THE SUN DIAL (Jan. 20).—When Mrs. Vernon bought a fine old estate in the South, Jane, her daughter, was delighted for several reasons. For one thing, the beautiful old white house set among heavily shaded lawns, appealed strongly to her youthful imagination. For another, the destroyer flotilla was stationed near at hand. The "Fosdyke" was the flagship of the flotilla and on the "Fosdyke" was a certain Ensign Gridley Thurston. From this it may be gathered that Ensign Gridley Thurston was a person of some importance to Miss Jane Vernon. This was perfectly true, but Miss Jane Vernon was quite careful not to let Thurston know it. He called on her very often. She was a person of very considerable importance to him and he did not waste any opportunities to tell her so. Then one day they had a quarrel. It was a ridiculous little quarrel, but as neither of them would give in, soon assumed a portentous character. Thurston remarked that the "Fosdyke" was going to sea soon and that he would be glad to get out on the nice, quiet ocean again. Jane said she was very glad he was going. Then he went and she wept.

She chose a certain moss-covered old sun dial to weep upon. As she leaned on it she noticed that it was a little unsteady. Investigating, she discovered a book beneath it. The book was the diary of Martha Dupont. Martha had lived on the old estate during the Civil War. She had been devoutly loved by David Thornton. They had quarreled. David went off to the war and never came back, and Martha died of a broken heart. All this, Jane read between the lines of quaint, old fashioned writing in the ancient book. So real did it all seem, that at the end she wept bitterly. Then she dried her tears and dispatched Noah, the old caretaker of the estate, to bring Thurston back. Noah had to swim to get to the destroyer because she was preparing to go to sea. He gave Jane's note to Thurston and that young man's commander permitted him to take a day off to say good-bye to his girl, and to meet the ship farther down the coast.

THE UNCANNY MR. GUMBLE (Jan. 21).—Hayden Carroll was an artist, and his friends believed in him. They believed in him because he had the true artistic temperament, which is to say that he painted his pictures without caring in the least whether anyone liked them or bought them. Unfortunately, one cannot maintain the god-like attitude of detachment necessary for artistic endeavor very long in our present workaday world without other visible means of support. If an enraptured populace does not spontaneously shower gold upon one, one is regrettably forced to earn one's own living. Thus Carroll. After he finished his paintings, his previous carelessness was changed to a very lively interest in selling them. Otherwise he would have starved. One day the business manager of "The Scream" offered him five thousand dollars a year for a weekly set of humorous sketches. Carroll shuddered at the thought, but at length driven by necessity, began the first of the drawings, a hideous caricature which he called "Mr. Gumble." His artist friends recoiled from him in horror and Blanche Frayne, the girl he loved more even than his art, declared that she intended to marry an artist—not a sign painter.

Hayden sat down before the canvas of his creation and fell asleep. His dreams were haunted by the absurd figure of Mr. Gumble. Wherever he went, whatever he did, the figure stayed close by his side and crowds of his friends mocked and scoffed at him because of his new companion. The climax was reached when in his dream he hurried to Blanche's house. Of course Mr. Gumble was there before him, but when Carroll tried to kill this child of his brain, Blanche stopped him. She said she loved Mr. Gumble more than she did Carroll. Then, still in his dream, Carroll returned to his studio and chased the uncanny Gumble about. At last he seized a paper knife, struck him and awoke to find his sketch for "The Daily Scream" ripped across. Blanche came in and found him thus. Her joy at what he had done was so great that Carroll voluntarily swore never again to delve in commercialism. Best of all, after they were married, he painted really good pictures that really did sell.

THE NECKLACE OF RAMESES (Special—Three parts—Jan. 23).—When his daughter, the Princess Ameena, died, Rameses, the Egyptian Pharaoh, placed a necklace about her neck and swore that whoever took it thence should never rest in peace until it was returned. Some thousands of years later, Ameena's mummy was unpacked in the New York Art Museum and the necklace was discovered. The news of the discovery of the priceless relic reached the ears of a band of thieves and "Diamond Mary" was despatched to steal the necklace. She was successful in her mission, but the tremendous sensation caused by the theft made it absolutely impossible to dispose of the jewels in America. Accordingly Mary sailed for England, where she was joined by "English Jim," an accomplished criminal. Detective Imbert was engaged by the museum to conduct the search for the missing relic.

Imbert followed Mary to England and had her arrested, but not before she had given the necklace to her confederate. The pair escaped to Paris, and there Imbert had "English Jim" arrested with equally futile results. Then he followed them to Venice, where they overpowered him after an exciting chase in gondolas. Then to Rome, where "English Jim" paid the penalty of his ill-spent life by falling from a roof in an attempt to escape the relentless sleuth. How Imbert gave up the chase in Naples and how he finally recovered the gems in New York there is not space to tell. Nor is there room to describe the wonderful historic settings in which so many of the scenes are laid. We can only mention Notre Dame in Paris, the Grand Canal, the Campanile and the Doge's Palace in Venice, the Forum, the Colosseum, and St. Peter's.

UNITED IN DANGER (Jan. 24).—When young Gerald Stuyvesant went down to his club and saw several of his friends laughing over a newspaper, he naturally asked them what it was all about. When they showed him the paper he was sorry he had asked. Two photographs were placed side by side at the head of the page. One was his own; the other was that of Miss Maud Varian, a musical comedy star who had just risen to her first success. Gerald was very indignant. Even if he had just come into more millions than many people had dollars there was no reason why he should be held up to the ridicule of his friends side by side with a common actress. Some time later, Gerald met Miss Varian at a musicale whither she had come to sing. Still smarting from the newspaper episode, he treated her with a frozen impassiveness that wounded her.

Maud Varian was a thoroughly nice girl. After many years of uncomplaining hardships she had jumped in a night to the pinnacle of fame. She had seen the pictures in the newspaper with a thrill of satisfaction. What had been unpleasant notoriety for Stuyvesant was the hall mark of success for her. His coolness hurt her more than he could have suspected. Stuyvesant left the musicale in a sullen mood. The girl's face, with its surprised look of disappointment, haunted him and troubled him with a vague feeling of remorse. That night he decided to go and see her play. In the middle of the second act, a tiny spiral of smoke arose from the middle of the stage. It rapidly thickened and the awful truth soon spread behind the scenes that the room below the stage was on fire. Maud's little sister was in the dressing-room near the danger, but Maud never paused in the performance of her duty. Ordering the spotlight man to throw on a red spotlight, she stepped upon the stage and began to dance. The audience taking the smoke for a necessary attribute of a fire dance, remained seated while the ushers went quietly about the task of emptying the house. Maud almost overcome by the smoke, danced on. At last she staggered and fell. Gerald leaped from the staged box, caught her up and carried her outside. Some time later their pictures appeared together in the newspapers again.

THE LOVELY SENORITA (Jan. 26—Second of Wood B. Wedd series).—When Mr. Wood B. Wedd fell into a comfortable legacy, he decided to leave the home of his ancestors behind him and to go to the romantic land of South America in his quest of a wife. The day after he arrived in the little republic of Santa Marina, Wood walking along the street, encountered the dusky Senorita Paprika and was swept off his feet. He knelt down in the middle of the street and besought her to be his wife. The Senorita Paprika giggled faintly. She thought Wood B. Wedd was very funny to look at and told him that she could not possibly consider his suit unless she saw him clad in the customary costume of Santa Marina. Wedd went to a store and purchased a beautiful set of clothes of the most approved South American cut. When he put them on he looked like a vaquero or a toreador or whatever the proper word is. Then he went to see Paprika. Paprika was charmed with Wood B.'s appearance. But after she had left him, Wood was confronted by two ferocious gentlemen, the Senores Tobasco and Tomale, both suitors of the lovely Paprika. Wood fled, but was pursued and caught. To escape instant death from a long ferocious knife, Wood crossed the palms of the honorable Senores with gold. Meeting the lovely Paprika, Wood expatriated at some length on the fierce combat he had undertaken for her sake. His story won the fair Paprika. Like Desdemona, she loved him for the dangers he had passed. After a short and unexpectedly terminated serenade beneath her window, Paprika and Wood eloped. On their way to the coast, they stopped at an inn, where Wood was initiated in the spicy mysteries of the hot tomale. Later they ran into a revolution. Wood was captured by the federals and condemned to death as a spy. After an altercation with the commander of the firing squad as to the exact portion of his anatomy he wished the bullets to penetrate, Wood resigned himself to death. Just before the fatal volley, however, he was rescued by an insurrecto attack brought on by the gallant Paprika. Wood's conduct in the ensuing battle was so novel, however, that Paprika deserted him and Wood B. found his marital hopes blasted again.

THE MYSTERY OF THE TALKING WIRE (Jan. 27—Third mystery in the Chronicles of Cleek).—When the body of a drowned man was discovered floating in the channel, John Beachman, the Government official in charge of the Docking Yard, telephoned at once to Scotland Yard. It happened that Cleek had nothing to do at the time and so, on the off chance of something interesting being connected with the case, he went down to the Dock Yard with Inspector Narkom. As it turned out, something distinctly interesting was connected with the case. In the pocket of the drowned man was found a bundle of papers containing secret government information concerning the dockyard.

The information contained in the papers was known to only two people, John Beachman and his son, Harry, who had acted as his father's private stenographer. Since John Beachman's record placed him above suspicion, Harry was arrested and Cleek was engaged to unravel the mystery. Sir Charles Fordeck, of the admiralty office, took temporary charge of John Beachman's affairs. The next day there was a violent thunderstorm. After a vivid flash of lightning, Sir Charles' stenographer sprang from his chair, complaining that he had received an electric shock from the typewriter. Shortly afterward the telegraph operator in a nearby hotel brought in a message he had received from an unknown source. To the amazement of Sir Charles, the telegram contained information he had dictated to his stenographer only an hour before.

Cleek was summoned, and in a short time solved the mystery. Gretna Hillman, a young foreigner engaged to Harry Beachman, and at present a guest of her fiance's mother, was actually a foreign spy. From each of the letters of the typewriter in Beachman's office wires led to Gretna's room. Whenever a document was written on the typewriter, Gretna read the message of the wires. Then she telegraphed her information to a confederate in the nearby hotel who wrote the message out and gave them to the man who had been accidentally drowned on the docks. The flash of lightning killed the accomplice in the hotel, twisted Gretna's wire with that of the hotel operator and shocked the man at the typewriter. Gretna escaped, but Cleek's positive testimony released Harry Beachman and effectually stopped the leak in the government office.

HOW BOBBIE CALLED HER BLUFF (Jan. 28).—Rosalyn was a very nice little girl, but when she started to wear long skirts and put up her hair she decided that the time had come to put aside childish things, and to be a real young lady. She decided that she was made of much finer clay than the rest of the people in Ragsdale. She had a soul. Rosalyn was easily the prettiest girl in Ragsdale, and consequently had a tremendous amount of attention. But, on account of her beautiful soul, she was cold to her rural admirers. When they called, she fell into poetic trances, and spoke vaguely about Synge and the Celtic Renasence, about which she knew nothing whatsoever. Rosalyn had everybody bluffed to a standstill, with the exception of her young brother, Bobbie. Bobbie knew several things about his inspired sister. For one thing, that she was actually much more fond of Nick Carter than of the high-brow books she carried about so ostentatiously.

When Rosalyn learned that the cultured young Herr Ludwig Dietmann was to be present at the Mayor's party in the following week, she decided to set her cap for him, largely to spite a certain Dick Rogers, who had lately returned from college, and affected an amused contempt for her aesthetic poses. Since Herr Ludwig Dietmann could not speak a word of English, Rosalyn bought a German-English conversation book, and attempted to familiarize herself with its contents. Bobbie discovered the book, and with fiendish ingenuity effected a few changes with a pair of scissors and glue.

On the evening of the Mayor's party, Rosalyn captured the German, and led him off to a quiet corner. The German was considerably surprised when Rosalyn, after a surreptitious glance at Bobbie's modified book, said "Ich liebe dich." She didn't know it meant "I love you." She thought it meant "Isn't it a beautiful day?" There was nothing for the German to do except kiss Rosalyn. So he did. And when she screamed, and thought she was saying "Go away," in German, she said "I like that very much." The situation was growing distinctly strained, when Dick Rogers came in and cleared matters up by speaking to Dietmann in excellent German. Rosalyn was very angry at first, but after a time she decided to tell Dick she was sorry.

THE CALL OF THE FOOTLIGHTS (Jan. 28).—Sophie and Enoch worked in a large hotel. Sophie was a chambermaid. Enoch was a bellboy. Sophie was small and plain, but beneath her placid face there lurked the fires of romance. Sophie in her secret heart knew that she was a genius. Enoch was tall. He approached the conventional idea of a bell tower far more closely than that of a bellboy. We do not know exactly how tall he was. At a guess we should say nine feet, or possibly yards. Apart from his majestic height, Enoch was also plain to outward view. But, like Sophie, he was conscious of dim-half-comprehended pulsings of genius within his giraffe-like frame.

When Miss Ashton came to live at their hotel, the pathway of fame opened out before the astonished eyes of Enoch and Sophie. Miss Ashton Practice Economy and Give a Brilliant Picture— Mr. Exhibitor!

TO BE AN ECONOMIST, a man must be first a Scientist. He must be both a man of action and one who knows why he acts. He must work and he must contemplate his work. He must act and he must think.

A Scientist is the man who has done the thing—who has seen and knows. Then from his positive knowledge springs his philosophy. And the philosophy of a business man analyzed, explained and formulated, would constitute a Science of Economics.

The world's greatest prizes in the future will go to the business man. The modern business man practices economy and to him we must look for the application of the Science of Economics to every day business that will eradicate poverty, disease, superstition — all that dissipates and destroys. The day is dawning!

was an actress. When she learned that the dearest desire of Enoch and Sophie was to act, Miss Ashton resolved to help them along. She had a very keen sense of humor.

Accordingly, she searched among her things, found a play of the deepest and gloomiest type of melodrama and decided that it would be just the thing for Enoch and Sophie. She supplied them with costumes and all other necessaries and set them to rehearsing the play. The rehearsals nearly killed Miss Ashton. She was only a poor, weak woman and she felt that she could not survive much more of the helpless laughter that seized her whenever the curious pair started to act.

But at last the period of rehearsal was over. Miss Ashton managed to get them an opening in a ten-cent theater. It is useless for us to attempt to explain what happened to Enoch and Sophie in that theater. Art is long and time is fleeting. They discovered the first part of this truth toward the beginning of their performance and near the end they learned that there are other things than time which are fleeting. They used a hook in that particular theater.

THE PERFECT TRUTH (First of Dolly of the Dailies Series — Jan. 31).— The day after Dolly Desmond had startled the community with the excellence of her graduation oration, Bobby North, a reporter on the local paper, suggested that it would be a good idea for her to write stories and things for his paper. Dolly was delighted with the idea, and started at once to put it into effect. She decided to write a story, which, although ostensibly fictional, should actually give a truthful picture of life about her as she saw it.

After a week of hard work, which involved much burning of midnight oil and much weariness for the fair young authoress, the masterpiece was finished. The editor was delighted with it. It was published under the title, "The Perfect Truth—a Story of Real Life" and, at Dolly's request, the name of the author was omitted. On the afternoon of the publication of the story, the Ladies' Home Sewing Guild was engaged in its customary routine of languid needlework and somnolent gossip. One of the members began to read "The Perfect Truth," but stopped with a gasp of surprise, and called the attention of the other members to the article.

In graphic, pitiless bits of description, the essential characteristics of each of the members of the Ladies' Guild were set forth so plainly, that there was no possibility of mistaking their several identities. Dolly had used the pen of a satirist with telling effect. The meeting of the Ladies' Guild ended in a furore of confusion. Mrs. Broome, the hostess of the afternoon, who had been particularly scored by the anonymous author, rushed to the newspaper office and demanded the name of her defamer. The editor refused to give her the desired information, but a note from Dolly on Bobby's desk made all things clear to Mrs. Broome. With the spreading of the news, the storm center shifted to Dolly's home. While indignant citizens waited on Mr. Desmond, and threatened to withdraw their accounts from his bank, the infuriated wives filled Mrs. Desmond's ears with their complaints. Dolly's father commanded her to stop the story and make a public apology, but Dolly, for the first time in her life, refused to comply with her parents' wishes. With the fifty dollars her story had brought in, she left for the city to earn her own living. We shall discover later what happened to her there.

THE SILENT DEATH (Jan. 30—Special—2 parts).—Jack Latham and his brother Robert were joint proprietors of a large plantation in Central America. Jack was very much in love with Grace Gardner, the daughter of the American consul. When she and her father were obliged to make a long journey into the interior, Jack was inconsolable. After moping about for a few days, he decided to go hunting. Consul Gardner left his office in charge of a scamp named Costigan, who had been engaged in several rather shady deals. Costigan, who was ready to do anything under the sun for money, readily entered into the plan of Don Manuel Lopez to gain possession of the Latham plantation. While Jack was absent in the woods, a file of soldiers suddenly appeared at the plantation, seized Robert, and took possession of the place. Meanwhile, Jack had been overcome by an attack of swamp fever. His life was saved by Tolida, an Indian girl, for whose brother, Jack had once done a great kindness. Tolida nursed Jack back to health and then told him that his brother had been sentenced to death on a trumped-up charge. Jack, still weak and faint, went with Tolida to acting-Consul Costigan. That worthy refused to lift a finger in help. In desperation, Jack seized a rifle with a silencer attached, which was lying in the Consul's office and rushed to his brother's aid.

Climbing into a tower near the execution ground, Jack succeeded in shooting the officer in charge just as he was about to give the order for Robert's death. Then with careful shots, he brought down several of the other chief men. HOW THE EARTH WAS CARPETED (Feb. 2).— The mighty Kalpoor of Swat had a shrewd suspicion that as a raconteur of humorous stories he had quite a bit on the justly famed Joe Miller. The Kalpoor liked everybody to be cheerful about him and he particularly liked everybody to explode in roars of laughter whenever he cracked a joke.

Nur-ed-Din was a peculiarly poetic poet. Because he was so particularly peculiar and poetic, and also because he was desperately in love with the Princess Zulika, it happened that he one day failed to laugh at one of the Kalpoor's witticisms. The justly incensed potentate immediately exiled the poet from his court. Some weeks later, the light of Asia, the Mighty Elephant, the Kalpoor of Swat, placed his saintly foot on an ordinary pebble and leaped into the air with a loud and particularly devout exclamation.

The idea that his austere and roseate foot should thus be subject to indignity from such lowly objects as pebbles struck the Kalpoor as a distinct reflection on the existing condition of things. Accordingly he issued a proclamation promising tremendous sums of gold and the hand of his daughter, Zulika, to the man who should carpet the earth for him. Zulika, who had her own ideas on the subject of marriage, went and begged her banished Nur-ed-Din to try to do something. So while the wise men and philosophers racked their brains in vain over the problem, Nur-ed-Din let his own massive intelligence dwell lightly on possible solutions. And at last he hit it.

The Kalpoor was in a very bad humor when Nur-ed-Din disguised as an old man, presented himself at court. The summary execution of a few score contenders for the prize who had failed to make good had not appreciably improved the royal temper. But when Nur-ed-Din placed a fine pair of shoes on the royal feet and showed the Kalpoor how easily he could walk over tacks and broken glass, the monarch praised his gods in a loud voice, forgave Nur-ed-Din and bestowed the promised rewards upon him.

A TREACHEROUS RIVAL (Feb. 3).—When John Flynn saved the life of Ellen Ryan's little sister, he laid the foundations of a warm friendship which soon ripened into love. Ellen was a thoroughly nice girl. Her efforts to keep her small family together were tremendously hampered by the one great sorrow of her life, a drunken father. Peter Ryan was a gentle, kindly old man, and also a very weak old man. He had made alcohol a staff to lean upon and now after many years of dependence upon it, found that his feeble will could not subsist without it. When Bill Moffat learned that Ellen cared more for John Flynn than she did for him he laid a careful plot to ruin the policeman in the girl's estimation. Moffat knew that Ellen had been taking charge of her father's wages fore some time. He knew the old man was almost crazy with the desire for drink. So Moffat deliberately put temptation in old Peter's path. He refuses to lend him any money, but left his fat bank roll within easy reach of the old man's shaking hand.

Peter Ryan fell. He took Moffat's money and hastened with it to a saloon. Luckily Ellen intercepted him at the very entrance and took him home. Meanwhile Moffat hastened to John Flynn and telling him that an unnamed person had stolen money from him, demanded his assistance. Confronted by Ellen and the evidently guilty Peter, Flynn casting his duty to the winds, refused to arrest the poor old man on the strength of Moffat's testimony. Flynn was suspended from the force. Moffat went to Ellen and told her that he would not prosecute her father. Flynn had been the object of his plot and now that Flynn was ruined he was willing to let the matter drop. Ellen and her father hurried to the Police Commissioner's office and there the trembling old man poured out the true story of the whole affair. The Police Commissioner was a kind man and a just man. After a careful consideration of the matter, he restored Flynn to the two things he cared for most—Ellen and "the force."

The widow Black is weeping. Desmond is going to foreclose the mortgage at six o'clock. What does she do? She telegraphs her wealthy son, George.

Is this the L. L. L. getting up steam? No. It is the conductor playing cards with the engineer on the cow catcher. The conductor has no more money. George pays his fare. Pretty soon the engineer wins that. Then the train starts. It is only forty minutes late.

In a little while the train stops. It is tired. The engineer and conductor get out. They are also tired. They have been working for an hour. They have brought the L. L. L. safely over the shining rails for almost four miles. After a time they decide to load the engine with wood.

A ROMANTIC DRAMA (Special—2 parts—Feb. 6).—When Prince Stepan Norski decided that he would rather marry the Countess Maritza than preserve his rights as a member of the royal family of Balkia, the king, his father, was highly indignant. But Prince Stepan remained unmoved despite the royal threats and entreaties. He married Maritza and sailed to America, where, assuming the name of Stephen North, he settled down to the life of an American business man.

Sixty years later, John North, Prince Stepan's grandson, decided to go to Europe. He had several business interests to be sure, but the main reason for his decision was the fact that Helen Bond was sailing for the continent with her mother and father. John North was very fond of Helen. Moreover, Helen liked John, so there was really no reason why they shouldn't have married. But Helen's mother was ambitious. She wanted her daughter to marry a title.

At just about this time the older line of Balkia came to an end with the death of King Jan IX. The next heir to the throne was discovered to be none other than a certain John North, American citizen. The Prime Minister of the kingdom instantly set off to acquaint that young man of his good fortune.

North learned of his windfall in Switzerland, whither he had followed the Bonds, in company with Arthur Merritt, a friend of his. If it hadn't been that North was desperately afraid Helen would marry a duke despite all his efforts, he probably wouldn't have listened to the minister for a moment. As it was, he decided that becoming a king was the simplest possible way of winning Helen.

North was crowned and discovered that a monarch's life was a distinct bore. He was so hedged about with conventions that he could hardly breathe. But he won his reward for all the discomforts when the Bonds were presented at Court. The utter confusion of Mrs. Bond was distinctly gratifying.

The affairs in Balkia speedily became in a very troubled condition. After the revolutionists had made a couple of attempts on his life, North learned the true reasons for their discontent and sympathized with them. Arthur Merritt fell in love with the Princess Senia, whom the Prime Minister had decreed must marry North for political reasons.

So North decided to clear matters up. He gave Senia to Merritt, declared himself in favor of a republic, abdicated and sailed for America with Helen.

THE MAN OF DESTINY (Feb. 7).—When Monsieur Laporte died, he provided in his will that an annual dinner should be given to six of his dearest friends for so long a period as any of them should remain alive. Among these friends was a certain obscure lieutenant of artillery named Napoleon Bonaparte. In his dingy regimentals, Bonaparte made a striking contrast with the other recipients of Monsieur Laporte's bounty. The other five were aristocrats, powered, frivolous elegants of the day, careless and blind to the storm gradually rising in their land. From the heights of their disdainful superiority, they looked askance at the shabby Corsican lieutenant with whom they were forced to dine once a year.

Matters grew worse when the shabbl lieutenant dared to raise his eyes to the lovely Cecilie de Cloche Forêt. They grew still worse when M. Bonaparte, in a duel with Cecilie's lover, the Count de Passy, negligently disarmed that young man and made him a present of his life as though it had been an old hat. But before the aristocratic guests of M. Laporte had recovered from the presumptious conduct of their plebeian comrade, the storm broke. The peasants of France rose and cast their masters down from their lofty heights to ruin and death.

When the smoke and blood of the French Revolution had passed away, all but two of Monsieur Laporte's former guests had perished. Of these two, one, the Count de Passy, was a crossing sweeper, the other, Napoleon Bonaparte, was Emperor of France and master of Europe. Francois, who of old had waited on the guests, was now one of Napoleon's most trusted generals. On the anniversary of M. Laporte's dinner, Napoleon, believing himself to be the sole survivor, decided to visit the inn and dream over bygone days. In a low dive in the slums of Paris, the ruined Count de Passy overheard a Bourbon plot to assassinate the Emperor after he arrived at the inn. The Count hastened to the inn, arriving in time to frustrate the plot, by forcing one of the spies to take the Emperor's place and meet the death prepared for Napoleon. After the other conspirator had been led off by the guards, de Passy made himself known to his old enemy. The grateful Emperor, overcome with the memories of the past, bade General Francois resume his old duties of waiter. Then the Count and Napoleon seated themselves in their old places and drank to the health of Monsieur Laporte.

HER WAYWARD SON (Feb. 2).—Mrs. Woods is the mother of two grown boys. Both are in love with May White. Joe, the elder brother, believing that the younger has won May's heart, is silent. Ray, the younger, is somewhat wayward, visiting the town saloon and keeping bad company. His mother is greatly concerned at his not having returned home late at night, and asks Joe to find him. Joe goes to the saloon, where he finds his brother in company with ruffians. He orders him home. The next day Joe is summoned by the sheriff and notified that he is to be one of a posse to protect the stage coach, which outlaws have planned to hold up that night. The posse rides out to its destination.

Later, the stage coach is held up by four masked outlaws. The posse arrives in time to rout the outlaws, capturing three of them. Joe rides after the fourth, wounds him and brings him to a halt. Pulling the mask from his face, he finds it to be his own brother. He stands dumbfounded as his brother makes his escape. Ray, in his wounded condition, calls at May's home for assistance. She goes after Joe, who brings him money and advises him to go far away and begin life anew, which he does. Some time later May receives a letter from Ray in a distant city, saying he is doing well and asking her to come and be his wife. She reads the letter to Joe. He asks her if she intends to go. For answer she tears up the letter, telling him that he will never understand. But he does understand, and takes her in his arms. She confesses her love for him.

THE CATCH OF THE SEASON (Feb. 3).—Frances Dean, though without much fortune, is a peach of a girl, and at the summer camp a number of most eligible young men are bitter rivals for her favor. She is an ardent angler, and her suitors pretend much enthusiasm for this sport, and suffer much inconvenience. The other and wealthier girls of the camp are thrown into a flutter of excitement by the news that the young Earl of Durham is to visit the place, and his failure to appear causes intense disappointment.

Jack Deering appears on the lake. He is a modest, unassuming young fellow, and attracts the attention of no one except Frances. Jack and Frances soon form a warm friendship, based on their mutual delight in fishing. Observing this friendship, the original suitors jealously increase the ardor of their attentions to Frances, who at length intimates that she will give her hand to the suitor catching the largest fish of the season. In her heart she has no doubt that this will be the expert Jack, but luck is against him, and up to the last day of the fishing season each of the other men has a larger fish to his credit. Jack is in despair, and, in secret, so is Frances. Then Frances proves that she is no true sport; she resorts to a mean little trick, though no one ever finds her out. She goes and buys the biggest fish she can find in the market and while she decoys Jack away from his rod, she employs a boy to attach it to his hook. Jack wins with the largest fish on record in that region. Not until their engagement is formally announced does Frances and the bitterly disappointed crowd, know that Jack Deering is in reality John Deering Stanley-Rockbridge, Earl of Durham.

OUT OF THE DEPTHS (Special—2 parts—Feb. 5).—Albert Rogers, president of the National Bank of California, where John Harvey is employed as paying teller, has a winsome young daughter, Vera, who is loved by John and who reciprocates the young bank clerk's affection. The father is disposed to look with favor upon this state of affairs, until he sees John at the club one night gambling in the card room and drinking a little more than is good for him. Mr. Rogers takes John to task the next day for his apparent wildness, and as John seems penitent and promises he will never repeat the offense, the old banker restores him to favor, though naturally there is a lingering doubt in his mind and a slight distrust of the boy. Tom Carr, the faithful old watchman, who makes his home with his half-witted widowed daughter, Clara, idolizes his little grandchild, Allie, of whom John is also very fond. At a meeting of the bank's directors, it is decided that a younger man would be better suited for the position of watchman, and Tom is accordingly dismissed. John is sent with $1,000 in cash to pay a note and while on this errand comes across old Carr, who tells him that Allie is ill and that since his discharge poverty has gotten them in its grasp. John determines to

He knows that he will be suspected of the theft, and helpless to offer any explanation, he determines to go away. He enlists in the navy and then follows a sequence of events, exciting, interesting and novel, which result in the unveiling of the mystery, the vindication of John and a happy reunion of the sweethearts.

THE VAGARIES OF FATE (Feb. 6).—Gerald Durban, district attorney, cuts short his honeymoon to conduct the trial of some members of a society of blackmailers. He is warned that his life will be forfeited if he sends them to jail, but he obtains a conviction. Other members of the society abduct him by luring his chauffeur away and one of their members taking the place of the driver. He is taken to a house in the suburbs and left bound and gagged before a time bomb that will explode in twenty minutes. On their way from the house the three plotters get into a row and a rifle is discharged. It shatters the glass of the room in which Durban is imprisoned, leaving the spectator to wonder if it has killed him, as a flash shows Durban collapsed. Ronca, one of the gang, telephones to Mrs. Durban, while the chief of police is questioning her. From the telephone central he obtains the address from which the call was made and phones the sergeant at the nearest precinct to get after the man, which they proceed to do in an auto. The chief gets on the scene in time to aid in the capture, and a mild third degree reveals the facts. They go to the house to find that the bullet shattered the clock and stopped the bomb.

HER SIDE-SHOW SWEETHEART (Feb. 7).—Jim is the bearded lady with a side show. Marie, the snake charmer, is in love with him, but Jim fears her ungovernable temper. She threatens a breach of promise suit and Jim runs away, resuming men's clothes. He gets a job with a farmer and falls in love with Mary, the farmer's daughter, who reciprocates his affections. Jim gets in touch with the manager, who ships his stage costumes. Marie is on his trail, and arrives in time to use Jim's costumes and professional photographs as arguments against him. Mary is broken-hearted at the thought that her sweetheart is a woman, too, but Jim advances the argument that Marie would not want to marry him were he a woman and the argument wins. Cy, Jim's rival for the affection of Mary, shines up to Marie and the picture closes with the hint of a double wedding.

PAT'S REVENGE (Feb. 7).—Mary Ann McGonigal, a poor but highly respected widow in Tarrytown, is much annoyed by the persistent proposals of marriage from Pat Dolan, a hard-working laboring man. The widow, in order to get rid of Pat, consents to marry him. Pat in his delight goes out to buy the wedding ring. Funds being low, he decides to make the purchase at a five-and-ten-cent store, thinking, of course, the widow would be none the wiser. All goes well until Mary Ann's eagle eye discovers the price ten cents marked on the bottom of the box containing the ring. This arouses the widow's anger, which is none too sweet. She becomes frantic at the idea of Pat offering her such an insult. At that moment Pat arrives on the scene; the widow gives Pat a severe thrashing and throws him through the window. Pat, very sore, plans revenge; he produces two letters as a joke, which bring about a match between the widow and a Dutch policeman. On the wedding day the widow receives a cablegram from abroad stating that her uncle in Ireland has died and left her heiress to his vast fortune. Her love immediately returns to Pat and she dismisses the Dutchman.

VITAGRAPH.

HOW GOD CAME TO SONNY BOY (Feb. 2).—Struggling to earn a living, Roger Vibrat, an artist, receives an order to paint an enlargement of a portrait, the money to be paid on delivery of the picture. He has no canvas the required size and no money to buy one. He tries in vain to get credit; no one will lend money to a poor artist.

It is the day before Christmas. Sonny Boy, his little child, while showing pictures in a book to his mother, who is ill in bed, comes across a Sunday school card with the text: "I will not leave you comfortless. I will come to you." His mother explains to him the meaning of the text. When his father returns home, downcast, Sonny shows him the card and pointing to the words with his little finger, tells him that they are true. Roger braces up. He goes out and pawns his overcoat. He buys an old canvas on which to paint the picture. While cleaning the canvas, he discovers the signature of a famous artist on it. Wild with excitement, he cleans the canvas and begins to copy a famous painting. Rushing out with it he shows it to a dealer, who gives him five thousand dollars for it.

Roger buys food, toys and flowers for his little family; and when he returns home with his arms laden down with the gifts, Sonny, wild with joy, jumps up to him and cries, "I knew God would come."

a surprise, Mildred Desmond, the girl detective, sent to Terris County to clear the burglar mysteries of that section, is astonished to find her best furs and necklace in her maid's closet. She investigates and learns that Mary was to meet Ted, whose matrimonial advertisement she had answered, and who had cautioned her to wear her mistress's best furs and necklace in order to recognize her. Mildred realizing that it is a crook's scheme to lure Mary into a life of crime, resolves to meet him, posing as Mary. At eight o'clock, at Pennsylvania Station, Haddon, District Attorney, on his way home, is astonished to see his mysterious neighbor, Mildred, whom he has long admired at a distance, accosted by a stranger, whom he recognizes as Chatham Square Charley, a notorious crook. He is utterly disillusioned. Mildred, having recognized Charley, also plays her part, encouraging him and promising to assist him in robbing her mistress's house, and then elope with him.

Ted, alias Chatham Square Charley, comes early to attend to the robbery. He is followed and watched by Haddon, who has not been able to forget the part the man played in his suspicions of Mildred. As Ted is about to begin his job in her house, Mildred orders him to stop, covering him with her revolver. Haddon sees them in apparently friendly converse in the library. He determines to enter. He bursts in upon them just as Mildred finishes her denunciation of the robber. Haddon accuses her of being Ted's accomplice. Mary, hearing something in the library, enters. Mildred scornfully points out Ted to her. Haddon sees the real state of things as Mildred explains them to Mary. Charley tries to make a getaway, but is foiled and handed over to the District Attorney by Mildred, who surreptitiously shows him her badge of office.

HOW BURKE AND BURKE MADE GOOD (Feb. 4).—Stranded in London, Burke and Burke, comedians, are glad to come to America and give their act in cheap vaudeville houses for ten dollars a week joint salary.

Arrived in New York, they are immediately put to work. They no sooner get into their miserable little dressing-room at the top of a long flight of iron steps when they are called to appear before the audience. Their performance is so bad that it brings nothing but jeers. But whether good or bad, the manager intends to make the comedians, Burke and Burke, work for their ten dollars. They are kept busy all through the day and until late at night. When they appear for the last time, they are so fatigued they lean on each other for support, and are too weak to even use their slapsticks.

Burke and Burke get into bed as soon as they reach their boarding-house. They fall asleep before saying goodnight and dream about having to be ready to give their act the next morning. While they are deep in slumberland, the house catches fire. All are rescued but two girls and the two comedians. Firemen go back to get them. They find the girls first, and go with them to the room of Burke and Burke. When they awaken, they jump up in a dazed sort of manner and begin to dance and sing. They think it is a call to do their turn. The girls, who were terribly frightened before, are convulsed with laughter and forget their fear. The firemen have difficulty in getting the performing comedians out of the burning house.

The story of how Burke and Burke sang in the face of danger to allay the fright of two girls is written up in the newspapers, and when Burke and Burke reach the theater that day they find that they are popular idols. They are given "star" dressing-rooms, champagne and cigars, and are booked for 52 weeks at $1,200 a week. Even Burke and Burke can appreciate the humor of the situation.

LINCOLN THE LOVER (Feb. 5).—Returning from his inauguration, Lincoln, with the sounds of the acclaim of the populace still in his ear, and realizing in a moment of loneliness the emptiness of his life, dreams of Ann Rutledge, over whose grave he has said, "My heart is buried here." As he sits in front of his fire with the soft glow of the flickering light on his strong, kindly face, his mind wanders back over the years until he sees again the little tavern room in Rutledge, with Ann and the simple, rude frontiersmen. Lincoln enters the tavern room and hands Ann a book; it is a grammar. He has promised to help her perfect herself in her education.

Then comes McNeill, who calls Ann away, and who, down by the river bank, proposes to her and gets her consent. When Lincoln is told of her engagement he fights down his great longing for her in the knowledge that she is happy.

McNeill is called to the East to attend to his mother's inheritance, and Ann is left disconsolate at his departure. She turns to Lincoln, as always, for comfort. The months pass and bring no letter from McNeill. Finally she does hear from him, and learns that he will never return. Again she turns to Lincoln in her hour of sorrow and he comforts her.

The following Spring, her faith in men restored, she responds to Lincoln's devoted love, and consents to become his wife. Illness soon comes upon her, and in spite of all Lincoln can do to help her, she gets weaker and weaker and soon realizes, as do her friends, that her days on earth are numbered. Lincoln to himself frames the words, "It might have been so wonderful—it was meant not to be." The end comes, and Lincoln in spite of his manly strength can hardly bear his grief. Again his mind reverts to where he sees himself standing out in the snowstorm by her grave, with head bowed low, and an expression of great love on his sad face. The soft light of the log fire gleams playfully on his countenance as his old servant tiptoes in and looks a moment lovingly at his master, but quietly goes out again without disturbing his sleep.

MARRYING SUE (Feb. 6).—Sue's father has chosen Percy; Sue's mother has chosen Patterson, while Sue has chosen Jack. Mother and father decide that they can never be reconciled while each champions a candidate for their daughter's hand. The only thing they agree upon is in objecting most positively to Jack. Why they feel this way toward Sue's choice is unknown, unless it is that they have determined to outdo each other in promoting the chances of their favorite.

To settle the matter peacefully, Sue promises to each secretly; that is, to her father and mother, to elope with their choice. Mother now believes that she has won out and father thinks the same. Sue telephones to Jack to meet her at Perry Junction to elope with her. She writes to Percy and Patterson to meet her at the Old Oak. Percy dresses in girl's clothes so that no one will know him. Percy and Patterson meet at the Old Oak, and a desperate fight ensues between them, thinking that each has been playing a joke on the other. While this is going on, Sue and Jack are on their way to the minister. When the two outwitted lovers discover how they have been duped, they hasten to Sue's house and tell of it to father and mother, who, in company with the young rivals, hasten after Sue.

They arrive just in time to witness the final part of the wedding ceremony. At first Sue's father and mother are angry, but soon get over this, realizing that their daughter is happy in her own selection. Percy and Patterson storm in protest, but make a meek exit, as they are laughed to scorn by the happy couple and the bride's parents, who thoroughly appreciate the joke on themselves and the defeated rivals.

TAINTED MONEY (Special—2 parts—Feb. 7).—Greed prevents John Bennett, a wealthy financier, from giving any thought to the misery he causes among the poor people who are affected by his stock manipulations with wheat, which raises the price of bread beyond the reach of the masses. His beautiful daughter, Constance, shares his delight in his financial success. By accident, she learns that her father's gain is the ruin of an old chum of her's, Jack Forsythe. She begins to see the harm that has been wrought. A settlement worker, David Spencer, realizes that Bennett is responsible for the pitiable condition of the people, having closed down his factory rather than accede to the workers' demands for more pay. David enters the Bennett home and forces Bennett to accompany him to the homes of the people who are suffering. Constance, his daughter, prevails upon him to be lenient with Jack Forsythe, getting there with the good tidings just in time to learn that Jack's mother has succumbed from the shock of her son's ruin. Bennett slowly begins to realize that his idea is wrong; that he is really to blame for the suffering of others.

While walking to his work one morning, Bennett is set upon by the mob and has to be rescued by David. He now pledges himself to help alleviate the suffering he has caused. Its latest form is an epidemic of typhoid. Unknown to the people, and using David as his lieutenant, he succeeds with the help of his daughter in relieving much of the suffering. When, six weeks later, the suffering is over, the people come and demand to meet their benefactor. When Bennett steps out on his veranda, they rail and shout at him angrily, until David explains that it is he who has helped them. Bennett then announces the engagement of David and his daughter, who have fallen in love during their work together in the slums, and states that he resigns his place to the young man whom he considers the most worthy successor he could possibly choose. The crowd cheers him to the echo.

ESSANAY.

DAWN AND TWILIGHT (Feb. 3).—Mary Waters, an American girl, loves Pietro Delani, a blind musician. His uncanny talent is hampered by the loss of his eyesight, and Mrs. Denali, Pietro's mother, is informed by a specialist that an operation is the musician's only hope. Mary sacrifices the little money she has saved and pays for the operation, without the knowledge of Pietro or his mother. Pietro's eyesight is restored to him. His first thought is of Mary, whom he has never seen, and when he gazes upon his beloved's face, he is shocked to find that she is indeed a very plain and simple girl. He is disappointed. Mary realizes that she is not what he thought her to be. A little later we see Pietro, a musical genius, being lionized by society. His rapid strides to success bring about an engagement between himself and Edna Ainsworth, a society butterfly. The penalty of his indiscrimination is—blindness, and again Pietro is in a pitiable condition. Edna returns his ring. For a while he is disconsolate, but finally the thought of Mary brings back all his former devotion for her, but it is too late, Mary had already died of a broken heart.

INTO SOCIETY AND OUT (Feb. 4).—This amusing and diverting comedy depicts the trials and tribulations of a French nobleman to win the hand of a rich American girl. He is about to succeed when Fate, in the form of two tramps, steps in and he has to abdicate in favor of the higher power. It is a comedy that will please your audiences.

A GAMBLER'S WAY (Feb. 5).—Jim Kane, a gambler, prevails upon Grace Carew to marry him. Grace is undecided whom she loves the best, John Hunter, a ranchman, or Kane, but finally decides to marry Kane. Some time later, we see Kane abusing his wife, neglecting her and always in a state of intoxication. Hunter has always been a friend of the family and it was nothing unusual to see him in their home, but Kane, entering the house one evening under the influence of liquor, misinterprets the meaning of Hunter's presence there, and upbraids his wife—slapping her in the face. Hunter is furious, but controls himself. The men agree to take a chance—at cards, the loser, should it be Hunter, to forfeit his ranch; on the other hand, should it be Kane, he is to lose his wife. Kane loses. That evening in a saloon brawl, the gambler is killed. Some time later we see Hunter united in matrimony to Grace, which brings about a very happy ending.

BRONCHO BILLY AND THE RED MAN (Feb. 7).—Broncho Billy saves an Indian from starvation. The Indian's intelligence is soon discovered by Broncho, who determines to make the red man a partner in his prospecting camp. An accident renders the prospector unconscious and the Indian hastens to the village for a doctor. The physician discovers that Broncho Billy's marred face is filled with dirt and—gold. He tries to bribe the Indian. "Where did the explosion occur—see, Buck, I'm going to give you this money, tell me?" But the Indian is loyal. With the aid of two or three miners, the Indian is overpowered in Broncho Billy's shack, yet he will not tell them where the prospector has been working. Regaining consciousness, Broncho Billy enters the adjoining room in time to save the red man from the hands of the outraged miners, and the prospector voices his appreciation of the Indian's loyalty.

THE GRIP OF CIRCUMSTANCE (Special—2 parts—Feb. 6).—Thomas Rogers has been a servant in the house of the Edwards for years. The Edwards family has dwindled down to two women, one the mother and the other the daughter. The girl, Frances, is loved by James Darwin, a self-made man. A reception is given at the Edwards home and at it Frances meets a Jay Malden, a handsome society crook. Frances is fascinated by him and gives him permission to call. Malden calls frequently at the Edwards home. He is deeply in debt for his card losses, and finds it necessary, while at the Edwards home, to steal several valuable pieces of silver, which he pawns. The loss is discovered shortly after, and Malden confides to Mrs. Edwards that he suspects Rogers, the servant.

In the meantime, Young Darwin has called and is treated with indifference and coldness by Frances. He is bewildered by her actions and questions Rogers, who tells him of the intruder, Malden, and also of the missing silverware.

Jay Malden loses heavily at cards one day, and plans to call that night at the Edwards home with the intention of making a scoop. Mrs. Edwards, returning late from a social call that afternoon, in removing her gloves, unconsciously removes from her finger her engagement ring, which from years of wear had become loose, the ring leaving one of her gloves on the table.

Malden arrives and is shown into the parlor by Rogers to wait for Frances. Malden, nervous and excited by his losses, nervously fidgets with the gloves on the table, and consequently discovers the ring just as Frances enters. Malden, taken by surprise, recovers himself and hurriedly places the glove and ring in his pocket. Frances later orders Rogers to serve chocolate. While Rogers is serving, Mrs. Edwards enters, excited and angry at the loss of her ring. Malden, realizing his position if discovered, tosses the glove on the floor and places the ring in the vest pocket of Rogers, who is standing next to him. After a short search, in which the glove is discovered on the floor, Malden openly accuses Rogers of the theft. Rogers, protesting his innocence, is forced to undergo a search. The ring is discovered, Rogers discharged and Malden lionized.

Rogers, a broken man, starts out on a fruitless search for work, and is turned down repeatedly on account of his age. Near the end of his resources, he is in a quandary as to what to do, when he meets Darwin. He tells him of his position and Darwin finds him work in the cloakroom of the club of which he is a member. Malden also frequents this club. A few days later, Darwin is seated in the reading room of this club with several other fellows. Darwin passes around the cigarettes, and all admire his beautiful cigarette case. Malden, seated nearby, overhears their conversation. Before the cigarettes have gone the rounds, Darwin is called to the phone and the case is placed on the table to await his return. The phone call is pressing and Darwin leaves imediately.

The other members leave for the billiard room, leaving behind them Darwin's case. Malden, who has been watching them, advances to the table, and laying the book down, takes the case. To rid his person of Darwin's case, he hurries down to the cloakroom and exchanges Darwin's for his own, which is in his overcoat pocket.

This action is seen by Rogers, who on his approach had returned to the background. Malden then returns to the reading room and assumes his former position.

Darwin, in the meantime, has discovered his loss and returns to the club. In checking his coat, he appears nervous and Rogers questions him. Darwin tells him of his loss and Rogers tells him of Malden's actions. Darwin, to make sure, goes to the reading room and finds the case gone. He returns to Rogers and calls in the manager. He tells him of his suspicions and receives the manager's consent to search Malden's coat. He does so, and besides discovering his case, also discovers several pawn tickets, one of which is for the Edwards silverware. Tracy (the manager), calls in Swift, the house detective. Tracy tells him of the case, shows him the tickets. Swift, knowing that Malden will try to rid his person of the case as soon as possible, plans to get ahead of Malden. Accompanied by Darwin, he leaves. Malden comes down and is waited upon by Rogers. Malden at the sight of Rogers is uneasy, but game. He calls Tracy, the manager, and accuses Rogers of being a crook. Here is another side of the story, Tracy, knowing nothing of Roger's past life, while Malden, he has seen frequently around the club, always a gentleman and in good company. Tracy believes Malden and fires Rogers. Malden thanks Tracy and leaves.

In the meantime, Swift and Darwin have arrived at the pawnshop. Swift stations Darwin across the street and enters the shop. Swift in the shop, places Solomon under arrest and commands him to remain in the backroom, until he is released by Swift. Swift then disguises himself as a Jew and awaits Malden's coming. Malden arrives and is surprised to find Solomon (the real broker), gone. He offers the case to Swift. Swift makes an offer. Malden accepts and Swift proceeds to make out the ticket. In doing so he brings forth a pair of handcuffs. In handing Malden his money, he conceals the cuffs by the bills. Malden unsuspectingly puts out his hands to receive the money, when Swift slaps the cuffs on him, and Malden's crooked career comes to an end. Swift then calls for Darwin to enter. He does so, accompanied by Rogers, who had followed Malden. Later, Darwin returns to the Edwards home, bringing with him the stolen ware. He finds Rogers reinstated and Frances anxiously awaiting his coming.

Sargent's Photoplay Service
To aid those who wish to guard against the formation of bad writing habits, or who wish to estimate their progress, I offer the following service:
Script Criticism For a fee of two dollars for each reel, I will read your manuscript and write a personal letter, pointing out the faults of plotting, technical development, manuscript preparation, etc. Sometimes I can help you to make the script salable, but I do not guarantee a sale. I do not revise manuscript; I do not typewrite it, nor do I offer it for sale. I simply write you a letter that tells you what the trouble is.
Plot Estimates If your stories do not sell and you want to know why, send me five synopses and one full script. I will criticise the script and tell you whether it is your plot or your development that is wrong. The fee for this service is $5 for the five synopses and additional plot. Synopses must not run more than 300 words each. Send a synopsis of your undeveloped plot and fee of one dollar and you will be advised as to whether it will pay you to develop the same.
Please Note My fees do not include envelopes or return postage. Send prepaid and self addressed return envelope and remit in New York exchange; not local checks. I reserve the right to return unread (with fee) any story or plot that does not warrant treatment. All scripts must be typewritten.

WOOING THE COOK (Feb. 3).—Cora is an attractive blonde, who assumes the position of cook at the Smithers' farm. Henry, the farm adonis, is an immediate captive to Cora's charms, and begins to pay unusual attention to his dress. Also feeling the need of more knowledge on the art of making love, he applies himself assiduously to the study of a pamphlet entitled, "The Art of Love." Believing that practice makes perfect, he improves himself by frequent impassioned addresses to imaginary sweethearts.

But another rival enters the field. Little Adolph succumbs to the charmer and the microbe acts upon him just as in the case of Henry. The rivalry becomes furious and acrimonious, and the farmer friends become enemies for the time being. Mr. Smithers arrives just in time to prevent active hostilities. Henry, feeling the necessity of getting his rival out of the way, adopts several clever schemes tending to that end, but Adolph bobs up serenely each time. Finally the farm house gets on fire and each swain is seized with the same idea—that of rescuing the fair Cora from the flames. How the thing finally turned out is one of the best things in the story.

THE FAT MAN'S BURDEN (Feb. 4).—John White is a mountain of a man, and becomes greatly troubled when he finds that, despite all effort, he gets fatter instead of thinner. Finally he gets hold of a book on health culture and reads that, "rapid rolling on the floor for thirty consecutive minutes each day will reduce the flesh thirty pounds per month." This sounds so good to him that he at once proceeds to put the idea into practice. With difficulty he places his huge bulk on the floor and ponderously rolls from one side of the room to the other.

While he is engaged in this strenuous exercise, in the parlor below, Doris is entertaining her sweetheart. All of a sudden the chandelier begins to dance and the ceiling shakes, while strange noises assail their ears. In alarm they rush upstairs and standing outside of Mr. White's door, hear the grunting and puffing mingled with groans, since Mr. White finds the exercise to be by no means easy or painless. Doris rushes to the 'phone and asks Dr. Philbin to come at once, since she feels that her father is either seriously ill or crazy. The doctor arrives and together they all enter the room and the secret is disclosed. They cannot control their mirth and the indignant Mr. White, seeing young Pullman doubled up with laughter, sternly forbids him from marrying his daughter. How Ernest later traps Mr. White into giving his consent to the marriage, and removed much of the surplus avoirdupois, makes an amusing end to a good comedy.

BEHIND COMEDY'S MASK (Special—2 parts—Feb. 5).—Robert Robson and his wife are prominent members in a theatrical company, which is joined by Harriet Werner. The three are drawn in the cast for a new play, "The Death of Pierrot," rehearsals for which are being conducted under the supervision of its author, Arthur Lichtinger. Robson becomes infatuated with the new member of the company, and his attentions to her are later the cause of his wife's divorcing him. In the meantime, the injured Alice receives the attentions of the author of the play, and learns to love him.

The child of the Robsons becomes seriously ill and calls repeatedly for his absent father. Alice goes to the theater and vainly pleads with her former husband to come and see the boy. Lichtinger, finding the two together, unjustly accuses Alice of trying to win back her husband's affections. The child's condition becoming critical, Alice leaves the theater just before the rise of the curtain on the first performance of the play. In his anxiety for the success of the play, Arthur persuades her to leave the boy and return to the theater to play her part, which is an important one. During the performance word is brought that the child has died. The grief-stricken mother vows vengeance on the callous father, who refused to attend his dying son.

To this end she bares the points of the weapons used in a duel scene with Robert in the last act, intending to kill the man, who, to a large extent, has been the cause of her misery. Her plans however, miscarry, and in the course of the duel she is herself mortally wounded. As the play hurries on to a tense and dramatic finish, Alice bravely continues in her part to the very end, finally dying as the curtain falls.

IN THE MESH OF HER HAIR (Special—2 parts—Feb. 7).—Mrs. Forbes, a woman who lives for society and considers every one outside of it "impossible," writes her son, Harry, who dabbles in literary work, that the house party which she is giving on her house-boat is a success and that he will find plenty of local color for his next book among the fisher folk nearby. As a postscript, she tells him that the wealthy and beautiful Evelyn Crane is one of the guests, and hints that she would make a desirable match. Harry, wearied of the hot city, responds to his mother's request in person.

After a short time he finds the company on the house-boat wearisome and seeks the fishing village near at hand as a diversion. He is much interested when he finds a beautiful young girl studying her books outside of a fisherman's cottage, and enters into conversation with her. When he finds her intelligent and ambitious as well as beautiful, his interest is greatly increased, and he arouses in the girl a like interest in him. Tom Brooks, the young fisherman who was a boyhood companion of Hilda, is now the constant suitor of the girl, and he views the increasing intimacy of Hilda and young Forbes with jealous disapproval. Gradually, as the summer advances, he sees himself relegated more and more to the position of an old and valued friend rather than that of a possible husband. Finally he proposes and is told that she does not love him and could not marry him. Though he is heart-broken, he does not cease to be the faithful friend.

In the meantime, Mrs. Forbes has learned of the growing intimacy of her son and the fisherman's daughter, and to put an end to it, has the house-boat moved. Hilda sees the boat go down the bay bearing the man to whom she has given her young heart. After days of longing and waiting, with no word from the absent Harry, she determines to end it all and let the ocean she loves blot out a life that has become unbearable to her. After writing farewell letters to her father and Harry, she rows out into the bay and then, lying in the bottom of the boat lets herself drift out to sea. Hours later the boat becomes caught in Tom's nets, and on visiting them he is astounded to find her there, unconscious. He takes her to his home, where his mother nurses her back to health.

In the meantime, her distracted old father, finding her letter, goes to the city, thinking that perhaps she has followed young Forbes there. He goes to the Forbes house, and asking after Harry, is deceived by Mrs. Forbes into believing that her son is away from home. Harry, who really loves the girl, and believes that he has caused her death, has heard the tapping of her father's cane, but his mother tells him that he was mistaken and that old Hedges has not been there. Old recollections spring up in a flood and overwhelm him. He determines to go back to her and unknowingly takes the same steamer on which her father is returning. How the tap, tap, tap of her father's cane penetrates his half crazed mind and prompts him to suicide, and how he is saved by the girl he deserted, make a strong ending to a splendid and well played drama.

SELIG.

AT THE ELEVENTH HOUR (Feb. 3).—Alice Rodney, visiting New York, becomes engaged to Philip Barton. Her father, James Rodney, takes an intuitive dislike to Barton, and seeks information concerning him. He already is troubled with a son who is constantly demanding money and threatening him, and does not care to add another trouble to his family. Barton overhears the brother and sister conniving concerning the opening of the safe in the library at 11 o'clock that night, to get money for Ralph.

James Rodney, having discovered the unsavory reputation of Barton, calls him to his library about 10 o'clock that evening. They have an argument in which Barton fells Rodney to the floor, fatally injuring him. As he falls, he clutches Barton's watch chain, and as the chain parts the watch is hurled across the room. At the same time the clock falls from the low bookcase, and stops. Seeing the man dead, Barton coolly, but quickly destroys all the incriminating letters, and then with diabolical cunning, moves the hands of the clock forward an hour, which would readily establish an alibi for him, replacing the clock under the form of the dead man. In the meantime, Ralph, in order to keep the engagement with his sister, comes at the appointed hour, climbs through the window, and gropes in the dark. Barton rushes in, turns on the light, and calls for help. Ralph is discovered kneeling over his father's body. The boy protests that he found his father dead, but Barton points to the clock as the accuser, the hands having stopped on the hour. The constables arrive, working entirely on the evidence of Barton, take the misguided and unfortunate youth with them. A detective, however, who makes a more careful survey of the premises, finds the watch that was snatched from Barton, in a corner of the room under a case—the watch having stopped at the hour of ten. By placing the bits of evidence together, he easily proves the criminality of Barton.

THE LITTLE SISTER (Feb. 5).—Little Nell keeps house for her two brothers, who have a cabin near a placer claim, where they wash out pay-dust so rapidly that they have accumulated quite a store of it, which gives an added responsibility to the little girl, to watch its hiding place. She is further burdened with the care of a small baby sister, and although she is but a child herself, she feels the double responsibility of her position.

Two villains, who know the existence of the gold-dust cache, come to the cabin to lift it. Nell, however, has seen them coming from a distance and suspecting their intent, places the treasure in the cradle under the baby. Consequently, when the men search the cabin they cannot find it. They threaten the little girl, but she refuses to tell them anything and cautions them that the baby is ill. When the men depart, she makes a rush to the claim by a short trail to tell her brothers, and they miss her on the way home, finding both her and the gold gone. They are about to start out after the thieves and abductors when she turns up and tells them of her adventure.

THE HEART OF MAGGIE MALONE (Feb. 4).—Maggie Malone, a self-dependent child of the tenements, has instincts better than her environment, and agrees with the Bible, as she quotes it, "everyone should be decent." She is a pugnacious personage, and the jungle spirit is rampant in her. Brave in battling, she is fitted to subjugate, but lacks those softening influences demanded by the hungry heart of femininity. Grace was pretty and foolish, but had mortally wounded Maggie's pride. Grace's invalid father, whose stray acquaintance with Magie, in the park, had developed a curious friendship, was the memory when the moment for vengeance arrived. "Oily" Jake, who was favored by Grace, invited her to dine with him in a cafe. Maggie saw them enter the cafe, and being worldly-wise to the danger of "Oily's" company, who used "knock-out" drops, went home laughing wickedly in her prospective triumph. However, the memory of the dear, gentle old man in the park intervened, and when she presently rushed into the cafe, she found the girl unconscious. It was the work of a moment to drag Grace into the open air and then to return and mop the floor with boozy "Oily," so that he was marked for life. This not only saved the girl from further persecution and shame, but eventually it restored Maggie to the good graces of her own beloved Dan, who had thought the poor, old, sick man in the park was a suitor for the heart of Maggie Malone.

A MODERN VENDETTA (Special—Three parts—Feb. 2).—Judge Walcott sentences Bill Devins, a notorious crook, to ten years in Sing Sing. Fast following the oration of this sentence, the judge returns home to find himself richer, as the father of an infant son. This news is noised about, and Devins, who is sore, swears to get even, no matter when or where. Time flies by; five years pass. The convict escapes from prison, and hikes back to his sodden consort, Mary. This precious pair connive to abduct the judge's child, now a boy of five. Having secured the possession of the child, they drop the judge an anonymous note: "You will never see your kid again." Then they quickly "grab a rattler" for Chicago.

The boy, Tommy, is brought to a den of thieves, where Jim Morton teaches him to be a forger. Devins informs the judge what his son is being taught, which causes great anguish to his mind and that of his wife. Even though the judge has had the best detective service obtainable, no clue as to the whereabouts of the young man could be found. The gang decide to rob a wealthy suburbanite and Tommy and three men are detailed to the job. When Tommy gets inside of the house, instead of plundering the place, he wakens the owner and tells him what is about to happen. The owner, Walton, fires and kills Devins. The two other gunmen hurry back to Chicago, take Devins' wife with them and then make a quick getaway to New York.

Tommy is adopted by Walton. Fifteen years later he marries and goes to New York to secure a position in a big banking house. In going through Central Park one day he rescues the daughter of a Pinkerton detective from a runaway horse, but is dragged for some distance himself. He is knocked unconscious and falls motionless to the ground. One of the crooks who escaped from Chicago years ago recognizes him as the man who had "double crossed" the gang. He follows Tommy to his home and learns that he is employed in the Ashland Bank. The ingenious crook informs his confederates and together they plan to be revenged by making it appear that Tommy is forging checks. The crooks are successful in their plan and Tommy is arrested. His case is brought before his father (who does not recognize his son) and he is found guilty on circumstantial evidence.

After Tommy has been placed in jail a letter informs the judge that he has sentenced his own son to the penitentiary. The father of the girl whom Tommy had saved ferrets out the truth of the matter. The wife of the crook Devins calls upon the judge and tells him of the scar on his son's chest; she also advises him to go to jail to see his boy. The judge and his wife do so and for the first time in many many years father and mother embrace their son.

THE ADVENTURES OF KATHLYN NO. 4—THE ROYAL SLAVE (Special—2 parts—Feb. 9).—After Kathlyn's seemingly marvelous escape from the Temple of the Lion, where she almost became a victim of fanatical men, not to remark the hungry and maraunding lion, she is still followed by the wild beasts that rove in that vicinity in search of prey. She realizes her peril through some keen second sense, and eventually makes her way by woodcraft to a tree, at the base of which is an idol. This being in the nature of a votive shrine, it is frequently visited by the Pilgrims and pious Parsees, who offer prayers for protection from the beasts of the jungle and also leave peace offerings in the form of food. Above in the branches of this spreading tree is propped a rude hunting booth, where the native hunters have been accustomed to watch in security for the stalking game that prey upon one another in the depths of the jungle. This umbrageous tree seems to have kindly shadows, and Kathlyn takes refuge among its branches, exhausted after her terrible flight through the tangled woodlands. Unarmed, she realizes that she must now depend upon her woodcraft and fleetness of foot to avoid the dangerous inhabitants of that neighborhood. With this idea in view, she weaves for herself a dress of fibrous grass that blends with the flora and the branches of the trees, just as the markings of many wild animals does, comporting with their environment, giving them inconspicuous security. She completes this garment none too soon, when the carnivora which has been upon her trail, rounds up at the base of the tree and settles down with fearful roars and snarling, warning her that it is time for her to look to her safety. She is so surprised that in her haste to get away she drops her tattered and discolored temple gown, fleeing further into the depths of the everglades in her new garb blending so well with the surroundings that it helps to conceal her whereabouts. Bruce, the American hunter, who accomplished Kathlyn's rescue in the amphitheater from the forty hungry lions, has been hot upon her trail since the stampede of elephants drew them far apart. Undeterred, however, he has penetrated the depths of the jungle, followed her from the Burning Gat to the ruined temple, and now to the base of the tree, where he finds her torn and discarded garment. He is encouraged to continue his search with greater zeal. In the interim, some passing traders lose an elephant that has strayed far afield to feed and give chase. The elephant becomes panicky and in its flight almost knocks down the tree that shelters Kathlyn. In her fright, she tries to run away, but the traders who have come upon the scene, capture her, believing her to have been an escaped slave.

The chief of this band, after taking counsel, concludes to take his captive to a nearby city, place her in a slave market and sell her. Then follow a series of interesting scenic events, showing the method of caring for captives that have more than ordinary value in the eyes of their owners—for the fair Kathlyn at once excites the cupidity and admiration of the leader of the band, who naturally concludes he has a pearl of great price in her. (Incidental to this is the caste-mark on the forehead of the human chattel.) A few days after Kathlyn emerges from the jungle, she is put upon the auction block in the slave market of Allaha. Disguised in her wild garb of woven grass, bearing her caste-mark, and deprived of all the finery that once marked her as a queen, she is so heavily veiled she is not recognized by any of the dusky magnates who frequent the market of Allaha. Eventually she is sold, curiously enough to Umballah, who does not recognize her on account of the Saree over her face. Kathlyn, who has been successful in outwitting Umballah, concludes to reveal to him her identity, and when she does he is furious and indignant beyond words. While she was in the slave market, she managed to learn the whereabouts of Bruce, and conveyed a message to him through the caste-marker of Allaha. Bruce is again close, but is a few minutes too late to save her, as Umballah, in his fury, has ordered Kathlyn to be incarcerated in the same prison that confines her father. She had believed her sire dead, but when she is placed into the dungeon she recognizes the ragged and emaciated lost one and a joyous meeting drives melancholy from the inhospitable place. This, however, is short-lived, for the malignant Umballah appears and tells Col. Hare that his daughter Kathlyn is now his slave—his chattel—and that he will do with her as he likes. Instead of having the effect he hoped—in humbling the prisoner in chains at his feet it inspires him with fury, and Hare, now possessed of maniacal strength, springs upon Umballah like a wild beast and bears him down, grinding him against the rocky floor of the dungeon.

THE CONVICT'S STORY (Special—2 parts—Feb. 2).—In leaving his boarding house to attend a New Year's celebration given by Elizabeth, his sweetheart, Lawrence loses his invitation to the affair. Elizabeth receives a valuable necklace from her father. That night, the girl promises to marry Lawrence. As Lawrence takes Elizabeth in his arms, her necklace becomes entangled in his cuff link. The boy disengages the jewel and places it on the table. Shortly afterward, both leave the room. Elizabeth misses her necklace after Lawrence has gone home. Her father suspects Lawrence of having stolen it. Accompanied by a policeman, the man hastens to the boy's house. Lawrence declares his innocence, but the missing jewel is found in his dresser. The boy is arrested and sentenced to prison. Elizabeth is heartbroken. Six months later, Jarly, a crook, tells a group of convicts seated in the prison yard of one of his adventures. According to the crook, about six months previous, he found an invitation to a New Year's party. On the impulse of the moment, said Jarly, he attended the affair.

Later, the crook continues, he saw a diamond necklace lying on the table in one of the rooms. Entering by way of the verandah, he stole it. The crook declares that he then hastened back to the fashionable boarding house where he was stopping. Fearing that he had been followed, Jarly states that he entered the room of his next-door neighbor and placed the necklace in his dresser. Later, laughs the crook, the neighbor was accused of having stolen the jewel and arrested. Lawrence listens to this tale in amazement. Springing upon Jarly he bears him to the ground. Guards intervene. The strange story reaches the ears of the authorities and Lawrence is freed. Remorse-stricken because of the disgrace he had heaped upon the boy, Elizabeth's father consents to Lawrence's marriage to his daughter.

THE HAND PRINT MYSTERY (Special—2 parts—Feb. 4).—Kenneth, an inventor, is ordered from the house upon his refusal to enter his father's business. Ruth, his sister, believes in her brother's eventual success, while Bess, the younger sister, sides with her father. The Fields close their home and leave for the country. Dick, Ruth's sweetheart, presents her with a valuable diamond ring. Later, the boy is called from the city on important business. To supply Kenneth with money with which to enable him to complete his invention, Ruth steals jewelry belonging to her father and sister. She adds her engagement ring to the pile to avert suspicion. She leaves for the Fields' city home, where she is to meet Kenneth. In entering the house, Ruth leaves the front door open. Dick passes and discovers the open door. He enters the house and investigates. Ruth hears him and hides. Dick leaves a few minutes later. Kenneth arrives and is given the jewels, which he promises to return in a few days. Ruth hastens back to the country, where she finds a detective at work on the robbery. Dick arrives and reports his discovery. The family leave for the city, accompanied by the detective. The latter discovers a hand print on the stair rail of the city home. Ruth recognizes it as her own. Dick notices his sweetheart's agitation and persuades Ruth to tell him the story.

hand print. It is seen by the detective, but before he can examine it, Dick wipes it out as if by accident. Disgusted by Dick's apparent stupidity, the detective leaves. A few days later, the papers blazon the news of Kenneth's success. The boy is welcomed home by his father. Making sure he is unobserved, Kenneth passes the stolen jewels to Ruth. Accompanied by Dick, the girl slyly returns the articles to the cases from which they had been taken. The ring, however, Dick takes. After placing it upon Ruth's hand for the second time, he takes his sweetheart in his arms.

VACCINATING THE VILLAGE (Feb. 6).—Ralph, a young M. D., hangs his shingle in Hicksville. He is the only physician in town. The young physician falls in love with Rose. Bailey, a wealthy young hypochondriac, also loves the girl. His suit is favored by Mrs. Rand, Rose's mother. The woman frowns upon the doctor's request for her daughter's hand, declaring that Rose is too good a match for a penniless M. D. The lovers later hit upon a scheme. Shortly afterward, Rose declares that she feels ill. Ralph is hastily summoned. He gravely announces that the girl has the smallpox, and that it is his duty to quarantine the house. The news spreads and the villagers hasten to the office, where they shower vaccination fees upon the young doctor. Bailey rushes into the office. To get him out of the way, Ralph declares that the young man has smallpox in its most virulent form. Terror-stricken, Bailey hastens home and tumbles into bed.

Ralph's suit prospers as the result of his frequent calls at the Rand home. To keep Mrs. Rand out of the room in which he and his sweetheart spoon, the doctor vaccinates the mother upon her ankle. Bailey, meanwhile, has summoned a physician from another town and learns that he has been tricked. He hastens over to the Rand home, where he wrathfully tells the story to Mrs. Rand. The two enter the next room and find the lovers blissfully absorbed in each other. Seizing Ralph by the ear, the mother demands an explanation. Ruefully rubbing the injured member, the young doctor declares that it was all caused by his love for her daughter. Remembering how cleverly he has fooled the entire village, Mrs. Rand finds it hard to remain angry. Trying desperately to remain stern, the mother demands to know how Ralph expects to support Rose. But the boy, pointing to his bulging pockets, cheerfully declares that he has made enough in vaccination fees to enable him to live in luxury for the rest of his life.

THE INDIAN AMBUSCADE (Feb. 7).—Having succeeded in wresting a fortune in gold from the hills, the miners start on their long journey for San Francisco. Jack and his sweetheart, Mary, are among the party. The caravan arrives at Hangtown, a frontier post. Wetlock, a half-breed, attempts to steal a bag of gold dust from one of the party, but is detected by Jack. The young miner frustrates the scheme. Later, Wetlock informs a band of Indians, led by Chief Young Bear, of the girl in the possession of the miners. One of the Indians reconnoiters and ascertains the strength of the party. Returning to the band, he imparts his information to the chief. The Indians thereupon decide to ambush the caravan. Jack, riding ahead of his party, discovers the ambush. He gives warning and a desperate battle takes place. The miners fight so furiously that the Indians are wiped out.

Winona, the sweetheart of Young Bear, comes upon the scene of the battle and finds the dead bodies of her tribesmen. Vowing vengeance, the girl leaves for the encampment of another tribe and gets their consent to aid her in wreaking vengeance upon the white men. The Indians ride ahead of the caravan and make preparations for attack. Unaware of the trap prepared for them, Jack and his party approach the deadly spot. The miner notices that a patch of ground a short distance ahead has the appearance of having recently been disturbed. Before he can investigate, however, the redmen swarm out of the holes they had dug in the ground and rush to the attack. The miners are completely surprised, but battle desperately. Jack fights with superhuman strength. He kills several of the Indians. Winona witnesses his efforts. Creeping up from behind, the girl slays Jack with her pistol. Overwhelmed by superior numbers, the caravan is massacred, and the wagons set afire. Her tribesmen avenged, Winona slowly walks away.

BIOGRAPH.

IF IT WERE NOT FOR POLLY (Feb. 2).—Youthful Polly Prue learned she was in the way, so decided to visit Grandad. "Horrors, she's kidnapped!" wailed the parents. Now Grandad was in love with Widow Wallace, who disliked whiskers. Off they came, and Polly refused to own him. Under the very nose of the sheriff he insisted on taking her home. "Kidnapper," yelled the law.

THE DILEMMA (Feb. 5).—"Just to say I'm tired of you and am going to pick my way alone," was what the wife read. Years later, when life was fresh again in the love and protection of the other man, the husband, long since reported dead, returned. He attempted to ruin the chances of the people's candidate for governor, but his malice culminated in his own destruction.

BEATING THEIR BOARD BILL (Feb. 7).—"No pay, no eats," was the motto of Widow Jane. So Horatio and Gustav were put to it, but fortune favors the brave. Gustav consented to play dead while Horatio, the bereaved, waxed plenty at the hands of sympathetic boarders. But the donation came back with the cop, who marched the erring Horatio and Gustav back into their midst.

THE FADDISTS (Feb. 7).—When Mr. Jenks came home to dine, Mrs. Jenks was always off "a-bridging it." Now Jenks belonged to the Indoor Sports Club, and they decided housework must take the place of bridge. Disguised as Swami Hasheesh, Jenks took a ten-dollar fee from every wife and then expounded the great religion, Flum Dum. There was the clothes-washing prayer and the floor-scrubbing prayer. That's how the ladies got the right habit.

MELIES.

BATTY BILL'S HONEYMOON (Jan. 29).—Batty Bill plans to make his honeymoon the one big event of his life, and it is. He hires a most unique postillion-led carriage with which to begin the journey, but his wife is, oh! so heavy, and pretty (?)—coin a word. Perhaps the horses are frightened, but certainly there is a good reason for the carriage not holding together. And so with every conveyance they select—chaise, cart and motor—all fail, and it is not to be wondered that the bride's dress-basket is the last resort of the harassed couple. It at least brings ultimate happiness, and in a way least imaginable.

WINKY WILLY AND THE FISHERMAN (Jan. 29).—It all happens because Winky has a good appetite. He is simply ordinary, everyday hungry, and the fisherman when approached refuses to hand out. So Winky, in his own original little way, takes matters in his own hands, out-maneuvers a watch dog, and in the end gets a square meal, even if the fisherman does have to go hungry.

She favors neither and shows her love very plainly for Dick, her suitor from the city. Hiram, badly beaten up after his fight with Si, begs Mary to listen to his avowal of love. She spurns him. The next day, they are all at luncheon. Mary's mother sends Si out for some honey from the bee-hive. He comes back; the bees will sting him. Dick decides to go, but he also returns without the honey. Hiram goes, and gets stung badly. Immediately sentiment changes toward him and he is the center of attention. There she is introduced to the other arch conspirator. She sees through her mirror that they are trying to give her drugged wine, but she thwarts them by throwing it in their face. She runs. The unrelenting villains pursue her. Down a steep hill she rolls. The villains follow. At last, exhausted, she falls, limp. They capture her and bring her back to the office. There they try to induce her to reveal the combination to the safe. She flaunts defiance in their faces. They take off her shoes and by tickling the sole of her feet, she opens the safe and as they enter, she swings the heavy doors shut—and locks them in. Her employer returns, and she explains. The arch-conspirators are arrested and dragged off to jail. Mary's employer lays his heart and hand at her feet and offers her his entire fortune if she will only consent to marry him. Nellie yields to temptation and at an opportune moment steals. The theft is discovered almost immediately. Captain Ronaldson sends for a detective and he questions the help. The detective searches everyone who was in the house at the time. In a moment of desperation Nellie slips the money into John's pocket. He feels it. She looks at him beseechingly, and he is placed in the strange predicament of either sacrificing the girl he loves or going to jail himself. He selects the latter course. When the detective finds the money, he confesses to the theft, and is arrested. John is tried, convicted, and sentenced to two years in jail. Nellie resolves to save him. She takes the balance of the money, writes a letter with it, saying that it was she and not John who stole the money and enclosing the other half of what was stolen. This she places on Captain Ronaldson's desk. The captain's dog comes in to the room and takes the envelope in his mouth, a trick the captain had taught him. He secretes it in the outhouse. A year passes. Nellie secures another position. Later, the captain is walking with the dog, when the dog leads him to the outhouse. He reads it astonished, and secures John's release. Old Cy casts longing eyes on Abarella's beauteous face and imagines that she returns his sentiments. She enters the store to purchase something and absent-mindedly gives him the note in place of a bill: Cy reads it and thinks he has won her. Cy finally gets the door open and two figures who have been leaning against it are precipitated in, the three going to the floor. His listeners outside and the ensembled guests downstairs are enchanted by High-tone's dulcet notes, and while he warbles away they listen spellbound. They commence to gently sway back and forth and indulge in the most weird dances, gazing enraptured with the expression of a dying duck. The song ends! Instantly the spell is broken, and the entire lobby comes tumbling down about the ears of the guests and the proprietor. All is excitement. They beg High-tone to sing once more. He comes to the door, knocking over the maids who are listening intently outside and proceeds downstairs, where he warbles once more. In the heat of battle Clifford hears the British call to retreat. Believing the signal to come from his commanding officer, he obeys it. At the fort the Colonel insists that no retreat call was sounded and accuses Clifford of cowardice. Clifford is court-martialed and sentenced to be shot the following morning. His wife arrives that night and brings the news that he is heir to a large fortune.

Believing that his life will end on the morrow, Clifford calls Major Bainbridge to his tent and instructs him to take care of his will and look after his wife and baby. Bainbridge, while Clifford is in the tent, throws the will he has just penned away and duplicates another, leaving Clifford's newly acquired fortune to him. Returning, Clifford signs it without looking it over. In the meantime, however, Ellingford, a private, picks up the discarded will and preserves it. Clifford is taken out the following morning to be shot. An instant before the execution, the Afghans make an attack and Clifford is wounded by an exploding shell. Later he is captured by the tribesmen and made a slave to Hassan Khan, commander of the Afghans.

Years pass. Bainbridge has secured possession of Clifford's estates. He has occasion to engage a new maid and Clifford' child, now grown to girlhood, secures the position. Unaware of her identity, Bainbridge makes ill favored advances to her. She escapes and returns to the little home of her mother. Bainbridge follows. In the meantime Ellingford has met Clifford and he directs him to the cottage of his wife. Clifford breaks in upon Bainbridge as he is struggling with the terror-stricken girl. Clifford removes his disguise and is recognized by the horrified Major, who believes him dead. He swears that he shall yet have Clifford's sentence carried out. Then it is that Clifford tells the story of how he was taken captive and held as a slave by the Afghans; he tells of his thrilling adventures, hardships and sorrows and finally of his escape from Afghanistan.

Bainbridge realizes the greatness of his villainy and repents. He gives over a letter to the effect that the charge of cowardice against Clifford has been dispelled and that Hassan Khan has confessed to an intimate knowledge of the British bugle calls. There is a happy reconciliation between husband and wife and daughter and Bainbridge pays for his misdeeds by death.

GOLD SEAL.

IN THE FALL OF '64 (2 parts—Feb. 3).—At a military ball in a Southern mansion the Confederate officers are amusing themselves. Captain Ford is the officer in charge and Virginia, the young hostess, is his sweetheart. At the height of their fun the sentries outside report the approach of Union soldiers. All officers hurry to their commands. At first the Confederates, having less men, attempt to outmarch the Federals. However, after a short time, they change plans and entrench themselves on the surrounding hills. There is a deadly battle and the Federals are driven back to Virginia's estate. Ford is detailed to enter the Union lines and ascertain the strength of the enemy. Once within the lines, he is pursued to Virginia's home. She conceals him under her bed and when the Union men enter she is found quietly sleeping. The Union men withdraw after she awakens and rebukes them. She follows them and holds their attention while Ford escapes by the window. Virginia, after taking up her abode with the slaves, disguises as an idiotic boy and collects valuable information. Ford is taken and brought back to her home. When he enters the room she knocks over the lamp and her lover escapes by the window and she escapes to her room and puts on feminine wearing apparel. The Union officer in command discovers her masquerade, but in the thick of battle she escapes to the Confederate ranks. The information which Ford and the girl have collected turns the tide of battle and the Union forces are defeated.

SLIM BECOMES AN EDITOR (Feb. 5).—The editor of the Bungleville Bugle posts a sign on the door, informing the citizens that he is going to a better town. On his way he meets Slim and sees him trading his horse for the Bungleville Bugle. On hearing that the editor has left town without paying his debts, the wrath of the citizens is aroused, and they vow to hang the next editor that hits the town. Slim takes possession and is confronted by the many creditors, who agreed to allow him thirty days in which to pay the debts of the former editor. He employs Molly as Society Editor.

The thirty days are about up and business is dull. Molly inserts a sign on the door of the Bungleville Bugle that coupons will be issued in the paper, and at the end of a certain length of time, the one holding most of them, can take her as his bride. Business begins to boom. The cowboys spend all their money in order to get the most coupons. On the day that the votes are to be counted Molly leaves for lunch, promising to return at one o'clock. On her way home, however, she meets a traveling man, and at once a mutual attachment springs. Before Molly realizes it, the clock has struck five. She remembers and tells the travelling man about the scheme. They finally agree to get married, and to jolly the boys along. Molly sends a note to the newspaper office that she is waiting at the church. They all make a bee-line for the church, only to arrive there and find that Molly has already become the wife of another.

PUT YOURSELF IN HIS PLACE (Feb. 7).—John Brown is discharged by the Green River Oil Company. He returns home only to find that his little daughter, Florence, is sick. The doctor is called, and the case pronounced serious. A month passes, and the child's condition is critical, owing to lack of medicine and proper nourishment. He tries the drug stores in an attempt to have a prescription refilled on credit, but in vain. Seeing a bank messenger enter a bank with a shipment of currency, Brown resolves to ask for a small loan from the bank. The bank president curtly refuses. Brown sees a revolver laying on a desk, seizes it and compels the banker to lend him ten dollars.

Later, Brown is going for the doctor, when he sees a small child in danger of being run down by an automobile. He rescues her. The mother of the child succeeds in obtaining his name and address from the doctor. That same day Brown receives a letter from the oil company, stating that a mistake was made in his being discharged, that another John Brown was intended, and inclosing a check for time lost and instructions to return to work immediately. At this point Mrs. Blair, the mother of the little girl that Brown rescued, arrives with her husband, who proves to be the bank president. Brown explains the conditions under which he was driven to force the loan, offers the check from the oil company to cancel the debt, but the bank president tells him that "his loan has been paid in full."

A RACE WITH DEATH (Feb. 5).—The child of an automobile mechanic is stricken with a malady which may require an immediate operation. The attending physician instructs the mechanic and his wife to notify him at once in case complications set in. A big automobile race, for a prize of $1,000, is to be held the following week. The mechanic is to accompany the driver of racing car No. 10. The race course stretches between the small town in which the mechanic lives and Los Angeles, fifty miles distant. The mechanic is on hand the morning of the race. The mechanic's wife comes with the announcement that their child is worse. Together they hurry to the physician's house, only to find that he has been called to a hospital in Los Angeles. Back at the race course the time for starting has almost arrived and the driver of No. 10 is frantic because he cannot find his mechanic. The signal for start is given and the racers begin. An instant later, the mechanic and his wife, carrying the sick child, run up, get into No. 10 and speed away towards Los Angeles and the doctor.

No. 10 is the last to start, but the nerve of a father fighting for the life of his child is of steel. Without giving a thought to the fact that his car is in the race, car No. 10 speeds past one car after another and passes the judges' stand at the finish well ahead of all the other contestants. The mechanic drives straight to the hospital. A check for $2,000, the first prize in the big road race, is later handed therein.

THE COWARD HATER (Feb. 8).—Harvey Martin, a millionaire of eccentric ideas, and essentially a woman hater, is telling the story. First, he hates women because they are cowards, and further, he believes that all of his sweethearts have loved him merely because he is rich. Jane, a poor but somewhat proud school teacher, visits her wealthy married sister. Forthwith the sister sets a drag-net for a rich match for Jane. Martin falls into the net and is informed by the intriguing sister that Jane is absolutely without fear. Martin grimly decides to put her to the test. He brings her mice, snakes and vicious dogs, but Jane controls herself and keeps up the semblance of being fearless. As a supreme test, Martin dares her to explore the graveyard at dead of night. She accepts the challenge. As a result of this test, however, she becomes ill. She thanks Martin for teaching her to overcome fear as she can now overcome her fear of poverty and go back to her teaching. Martin, however, now discovers that one who overcomes fear is more than one born fearless. Thus he asks her to be his wife. The end of the matter is that she does not return to teaching.

NESTOR.

FIRES OF CONSCIENCE (Feb. 4).—Two men meet in the desert. One is in search of gold and the other seeks solace and heartsease for an unrequited love. Although they are unknown to each other, each loves the same girl. Ray, the prospector, is the chosen suitor and around his neck he carries the girl's picture. They live together in the wilds and become friends, until one night Tom sees the picture in the locket around Ray's neck. Tom's jealousy prompts him to kill Ray, but gentle thoughts of Ethel restrain his hand. On their way through the desert they suffer from thirst. Ray staggers and falls. Tom takes the locket and chain from him and leaves him. He staggers along. He takes a drink of water, which he has saved for himself, but his conscience smites him and he goes back, gives Ray the life-giving from his canteen, and himself dies. Ray fashions a grave in the burning sands and buries his friend. He is discovered and rescued by outrider. He is reunited to the woman he loved, but even more sublime than their love, is the shadow of the dead man hovering over them, the man who hated deeply, loved intensely and was a gentleman.

TWIXT LOVE AND FLOUR (Feb. 6).—The baker loves his cashier and a neighboring grocer is likewise smitten. One day the baker's supply of flour gets low and he sends to the grocer for more. Discouraged in his love affair and in a spirit of revenge, the grocer mixes violet talcum powder with the flour, which is to be delivered to the baker. The flour is received and made into loaves. The loaves are delivered to the baker's customers, and the rest is war! All who eat the flavored bread become ill. The baker is held to account. His shop is mobbed. The young lady informs the union of the joke, and then she takes a taxi and rescues the baker from the mob. The union bakers capture the grocer and bring him to the bakery. They plaster him with dough and place him in the oven. When he is well cooked and brown, they take him from the oven and frost him, artistically. He is then placed as an ornament upon the immense wedding cake, which has been prepared for the wedding of the baker and his cashier.

THE LOSER WINS (Jan. 30).—Jim, entering the bank, drops a billfold. Nell picks it up, and a friend in an auto drives up and greets her, so that Jim, retracing his steps to find the billfold, misses her. She leaves a card, but with no address, and Jim, returning, begins his search for the girl with the billfold. Nell, reporting the incident at home, deposits the money on a table, and a fire in a nearby house attracts her attention. Tommy, entering to deliver a hat, finds the house empty, and in "rubbernecking" sees the billfold. Hearing someone, he steps behind the portieres and Muggs makes a getaway with the billfold. Tommy's story is not believed by the police and he's arrested. Jim, reporting his loss, arrives at the station in time of Tommy's arrest, believes his innocence, and bails him out. Delivering a hat later, Tommy recognizes Muggs and the billfold and reports to Jim, who in the meantime through the court incident has met Nell and a love affair springs up. Tommy leads the cops to Muggs and doesn't let himself be bribed, to remain honest—although Jim was the loser, he was a winner with Nell.

THE ELEVATOR MAN (Jan. 25).—The old elevator man had been employed in the office building for many years and was treated with much consideration. Like all of us, he had his likes and dislikes, and there were certain tenants for whom he always had a kindly word, while in the case of others he longed only to see them move away. A young stenographer and a clerk employed by one firm were the two persons of whom he was most fond, and he was pleased when they told him of their engagement. There was another clerk employed by the same firm, but the elevator man despised him.

The young lovers quarreled, as young lovers will, and it brought sorrow to the heart of the old elevator man. His sorrow turned to rage when the girl flirted with the clerk he despised, and he decided to take action in the matter. He knew that the clerk he did not like had a "yellow streak" and he determined to bring it out. He was able to do this by means of a little red fire and some unusual elevator running, and the young couple he liked were reunited while the old elevator man was convinced that life was worth living again.

AMERICAN.

THE HERMIT (2 parts—Feb. 2).—Grace King and motor party discover a picturesque spot and hermit. The masterful personality of the hermit so attracts Grace that she invites him to lunch with them under the trees, afterward persuading him to tell his past history.

Twenty years ago, the hermit, then a wealthy young man, was accepted by his sweetheart. His brother loved the same girl and being of an impetuous and emotional nature exerted himself to win her from his rival. Failing in this, he yielded to an evil impulse, and bribed a ruffian to chloroform and bring her to him. The accepted lover, being warned by telepathy, that the girl was in danger, reached her gate as the masked man was coming out with her. A deadly conflict ensued, during which the lover was beaten senseless. The girl revived; screaming for help, she rushed into the house. The conspirator realizing his own danger and in order to incriminate his brother, Jack, placed a mask over the latter's face and a revolver in his hand and then escaped.

The police arrived as the young man, with the mask still on, and revolver clasped in hand, was regaining consciousness. Circumstantial evidence gave him seven years in prison. But worse, his sweetheart repudiated him. She married the brother. After serving his term and being liberated, he never let his people see him, but left for California, where he lived alone for fifteen years.

After finishing his story, the hermit shows them his sweetheart's picture and with a startled cry, Grace declares it to be her mother. She tries to have the hermit go with her, but shaking his head he shows her a letter, sent ten years before, containing the dying confession of his brother and pleading for pardon, also entreating that his wife never be told the truth. Afterward, with much maneuvering and plotting, Grace brings about a reunion of the lovers.

TRUE WESTERN HEARTS (Feb. 7).—There were tears in Jed Thompson's eyes as he looked across the table at his son. For five long years they had toiled, enduring almost incredible hardships, to realize their all-consuming ambition—to own a little farm where they might settle down in peace and comfort: and now it looked as though that dream was in a fair way to be realized. "'Twas a mighty hard fight, boy, but we won and I'm proud of you," said Jed. Two thousand dollars, as nearly as they could reckon it, in gold dust, had been taken from the ground, and now the opportunity of a lifetime had come to them. Old Len Williams was ready to retire and his farm was for sale. $2,000 would buy it. Tom determined to look over the land.

Ed Thorpe, all 'round bad man, delivering a letter to Jed, had seen the money and his cupidity was aroused. He determines to steal it and enlists the aid of one Jackson. They descend on the cabin and find Jed alone. Tieing him securely, they demand to know the hiding-place of the money. Jed refuses to answer, and Thorpe, thrusting a poker into the stove, threatens to burn the old man's eyes out unless the information is forthcoming. "My boy and I have fought and starved for that money for five long years and all the tortures of the damned won't make me give it up," Jed answers them.

As Tom on his way to town passes an isolated cabin, a woman comes to the door and telling him that her husband has just died, asks Tom's aid in burying him. He learns that the dead miner is Jim Lawrence, a good-hearted fellow, who had more than once helped them over rocky days. "I guess dad would like to see Jim before we bury him and besides we will need his help," Tom tells the woman, and promising to be back in a few hours, goes off.

As he nears the cabin he hears his father cry out in agony. Thorpe has just drawn the red hot poker across the wrist of Jed, hoping to get a confession from him. Tom rushes to his father's aid and makes short work of the bandits. Deciding the cabin is no longer a safe refuge, they prepare to leave, taking the money with them. Hurrying to the widow's aid they help bury her husband. Now it is true that men have fought and bled, suffered and died for womankind, but few indeed are they who would make the sacrifice in its selfishness sublime that these noble-hearted miners made without a whimper. The doctors had told Mrs. Lawrence she was a consumptive. "But," she told Jed, "I don't believe it. I'm strong and I'll work for my little girl." Then the dry hacking cough of the consumptive seized her and Jed and Tom shook their heads gravely. "Ma'am," said Jed, "Y'see your husband was what you might call a silent partner with us and Tom and I have brought his share of the claim." O, noble falsehood! Down on the table plumped the little bags of gold that a few hours before Jed had told the bandits all "the tortures of the damned" could not make him give up. But she was a helpless woman and they were men and could hustle. Back to the cabin they trudged to begin anew the long hard fight—a noble father and courageous son.

MAJESTIC.

THE THIEF AND THE BOOK (Two reels—Jan. 24).—The Bat, a thief, about twenty-three years old, in order to occupy the attention of an old bookseller, while his partner, the Fly, robs the till, purchases a book at random. Later, after a chase and escape to the Devil's Roost, Old Meg's refuge for thieves, he takes the book from his pocket, and is about to throw it aside when the title attracts him, "Electricity Made Simple." The idea strikes him to attempt the wiring of the Roost, and replacing the smoky old lamp with electric light. His success opens a new life to him, and he seeks honest employment at the Electric Light Power Company, resolving to become something in the world of electricity. His conscientious devotion to duty and hard study, and love of the clean new life, lead him rapidly up the ladder, and after demonstrating his acquired knowledge by locating and repairing a puzzling break in the machinery at the works, he finds himself advanced to the office of assistant electrician.

About this time the fortunes of the old bookseller, the unknowing contributer to Bat's reform, undergo a pitiful alteration. After twenty years in the same location, he finds himself with old age handicapping him and is obliged to move out and give place to a new building, and seek other quarters. The shock sickens his soul and body, and selling his little stock with the aid of his fifteen-year-old grandchild, he takes to his bed. The old man dies, and homeless and penniless, Bess finally becomes a victim to Meg, and takes up her abode at the Devil's Roost.

Five years pass. The Bat and his former employer at the plant are now partners as electrical contractors and engineers. Bess still works her trade. Fortunately, it is the Bat who catches her at last when she attempts to "lift" his watch. Remembering his own past, he takes her to his office, and by kindness softens Bess's hardened nature, and starts her on a "clean path" by helping her to become a stenographer. His head typist volunteers to help Bess. She worships her benefactor and the Bat, too, grows instantly and deeply fond of his protege. On the day of Bess's arrival at proficiency the sister of Bat's partner comes to the city and demands the complete devotion of the men to her entertainment for the few days of her visit. They laughingly comply, and begin with the theater first. Bess in sudden and desperate jealousy, entirely unreasonable, drops back to her old self long enough to follow the party to the theater and skillfully steal the purse of the sister and bear it away to her old haunt, the Devil's Roost. She is seen and followed by the Fly, her suitor from the moment of her first entrance to the Roost. Remorse overtakes Bess while in the Roost, now hideous to her, and made doubly so by the renewed attentions of the repulsive Fly. Fly's persistence this time amounts to force, and he seizes Bess. The timely appearance of Old Meg on the scene saves Bess from the clutches of the Fly. Old Meg drives Fly away, with a warning never to return; he swears vengeance, and hurries to the theater, where the loss of the purse is discovered. To the manager Fly reveals the mystery of the Devil's Roost, where he informs him the purse may be found, and gives complete directions of how to reach the Roost by its secret entrance. The manager repeats Fly's story to the police and to Bat, the latter instantly recognizing his old quarters. Fly makes a quick getaway as soon as his purpose is accomplished.

In the meantime, Bess in the den, wraps the purse up and addresses it, together with a pathetic note to the Bat. She leaves it at the theater box office, and it is delivered to Bat while Bess is returning to the Roost. The Bat reads the note: "I stole this, but I don't want it. Might as well be a thief as be loving you, and breaking my heart. Thanks for too much kindness. It's no use. Back to the Roost for me. Bess." In a flash the Bat realizes that Bess must mean Devil's Roost, and there the police have gone to make a raid. Slipping the purse in the folds of the sister's cloak, he excuses himself and hurries to a taxi. The police are ahead of him however, and reach the alley-way to the Roost first, making it impossible for him to precede them and rescue Bess. Then he remembers the hole under the eaves which he cut for the electric wires, and climbing the rickety old fire escapes to the roof, he crawls through the hole, and warns Bess and rescues her just as the police enter and arrest Old Meg and the others. Safe at his lodgings, he explains to Bess how he knew of the hole. He gets the book that changes his career, now old and worn, and tells the story. Bess recognizes the imprint of her grandfather's stamp on the book, and in great wonder of it all they tell of their love.

A RIOT IN RUBEVILLE (Jan. 31).—A "Mellerdrama" company is billed for a one night stand in a tanktown in a lurid production entitled "Lizzie, the Poor Working Girl." The picture of the "heavy" in make-up, unfortunately resembles that of a horse thief and wife-beater in the vicinity, for whose capture there has been a great reward offered. A village rube with Sherlock Holmes instincts, discovers the similarity, and makes his revelations to a few choice cronies, urging secrecy. The natural result is a town agog with excitement. And the company enthuses over a crowded house. But the villagers are there for a purpose. This soon becomes apparent.

Chas. Dudley, the "heavy," off the stage, is merely a mild-mannered, brow-beaten husband to the leading lady, and answers the name of Henry, but on the stage! Well, it's different. He is busily engaged in ferociously choking the heroine in one of the most thrilling moments in the play, when one of the rubes, unable to restrain his cupidity, makes a grab for the prize, and the whole reward-dazzled audience, in an endeavor to "beat him tew it," begin clambering onto the stage. The villain bolts, so does the hero and a "dead man." The manager attempts explanations, but in vain. To the stage door surges the mob, where with tar and feathers, a rail and other implements of welcome, the bad one's appearance is awaited. In wild terror, the "white livered villain" observes their business-like preparations, then sneaking out of a side window, runs for it. He is captured and pleads for mercy. His wife receives the information that her husband is being tortured for wife-beating. Henry a wife-beater! How excrutiatingly funny. He is about to be strung up when his wife appears and demands his release. She theatrically pulls off his fierce mustache, which he has forgotten to remove in his fright, showing that his ferocity is merely a shell. She then takes her hubby in hand, and her treatment of him vindicates him beyond the shadow of a doubt from suspicion of wife-beater.

RELIANCE.

OUR MUTUAL GIRL (Jan. 19).—After a life spent amid primitive surroundings and country limitations, Margaret, the Mutual Girl, who has lived within the narrow confines of a farm house, receives a letter from her aunt in New York, a wealthy society woman and member of the best sets, to give up the life as a dairy maid and make her home in the great metropolis.

While Margaret is enthusiastic over the prospect, she is nevertheless sorry to leave her country sweetheart, but is induced to do so when a picture of grandeur, beautiful clothes and good times is presented to her. She comes to New York and, unknown to her, is followed by her country boy lover. Her aunt meets her at the Pennsylvania Station and realizes immediately that Margaret must undergo a certain amount of training for the society life that she has mapped out. She is whisked to the home of her aunt in Fifth Avenue in a limousine car and the next day is taken on a shopping tour, where visits are made to the parlors of famous modistes and equally famous shops and department stores until the girl's personal outfit is a liberal education in up-to-date dresses in all its multitudinous details.

While this is going on the country boy arrives in New York and goes through a series of humorous scenes in trying to find a place to live and work to the winning of his sweetheart.

TRICKED BY A PHOTO (Jan. 28).—A detective takes his girl to a seashore place of amusement and has her photo taken with his head on her shoulder. A noted crook does the same with his girl. Later the detective is sent out after this same crook and can only find his girl, who, of course, refuses to give him up. The detective recalls seeing them at the photographers and tries all sorts of schemes to make the girl give him up to the police, without success. Finally, he thinks of making her jealous of her lover and casts about for a chance to do so. He gets the crooks photo from the photographers and cuts the head of the crook out. He cuts his own head off of his own photo and sticks the crook's on instead and then has the whole photo re-photographed. He shows it to the girl, who thinks her lover has had it taken with another woman, and in a jealous rage, she tells the police where he is and he is captured.

TOO PROUD TO BEG (Jan. 31).—James Morrison, an old man living alone with his daughter, loses his position because he wishes to remain an honest man, and after vain searching for employment, is almost starving, along with his daughter, Bess. He frequents saloons and gets food for free lunches and even tries to get food from the garbage pails in the hall of the tenement where he lives.

A thief living in the house steals a wallet from the man who discharged Morrison, and Morrison, having been seen about the halls acting suspiciously, is suspected. His daughter is ill and the old man feels ashamed and would rather be accused of theft than acknowledge that he had been reduced to rummaging garbage to live. An old woman neighbor has seen him though. She tells his former boss and the real thief, who is seen throwing the pocketbook away, is caught. The old man is given his job back by his former boss and he and Bess are assured of a happy future.

OUR MUTUAL GIRL (Second Release—Jan. 20).—Margaret, "The Mutual Girl," is observed rubbing her eyes in bewilderment at the beautiful scene about her as she awakens from a pleasant night of happy dreams and is subtly conscious of luxury and softness. For a moment, she fails to understand the metamorphosis from a cold, farm house room, with its stiff, old-fashioned furniture and hard bed to a boudoir of beauty and costly furnishings, but as her eyes gradually open and become fixed on the heavy canopies of her Louis XIV bedstead, and her hands grope about amid a wealth of soft coverings, the realization becomes fixed that a new life is dawning on her and she is enthusiastic to rise and meet it. Her maid enters and places a tray of tempting delicacies before her, and as she nibbles at her toast, her aunt enters and discusses plans for a day of pleasure.

Meanwhile, in a remote section of the city, amid squalid surroundings and poverty, the country boy sweetheart of Margaret is awakening from a terrible night of discomfort. He is seen shivering in a hall bedroom of an east side tenement and, unable to stand the cold any longer, he arises and prepares to seek employment. A want ad in a daily paper catches his eye. He reads that the Cunard Steamship Co. desires the services of a young man to act as a guide on the docks, and he hastens to the pier, hoping to be the lucky one. The scene again shifts to Margaret's boudoir, where she has completed her toilet and is discussing the trip to the Yale-Princeton football game with her aunt, which they attend that afternoon. During the game a French Count of distinction and a friend of the Van Wycks greet Margaret's aunt, and after being introduced to her niece, are invited to call.

The country boy secures the job and the following day witnesses the arrival of a transatlantic liner. Among the passengers are two women, whose peculiar actions on the pier arouse the suspicions of the country boy. While he is watching them, the Count arrives on the scene and there is a whispered conversation between the trio. Convinced that they are smugglers or are planning some crooked deed, the country boy seeks permission to follow them.

The country boy has learned Margaret's address and that evening, after work, goes to call on her. Mistaken for the Count, the maid ushers the country boy into the drawing room, where Margaret goes into ecstacies of delight when she sees him. Her pleasure is interrupted by the arrival of the Count, who the country boy immediately recognizes as the man whom he suspected of being a smuggler, and a sharp argument ensues. Margaret's aunt dismisses the country boy, and receives the Count with gracious hospitality.

On the following day Margaret's aunt receives an invitation from the only woman senator in the United States, Mrs. Helen Robinson, of Colorado, inviting her and her niece to visit the famous Morisini estate. The invitation is accepted and on the way the two ladies go shopping. They visit Joseph's famous millinery shop in Fifth Avenue and make expensive selections.

She takes the money from the sheriff's strong box and gives it to her brother. He is stealing a ride on the stage coach when it is held up and John, wounded, is relieved of the money, but not before he has wounded the bandid, who later dies. A ROMANCE OF THE SEA (2 parts—Feb. 11).—Master Bell, an old salt, receives word that Roderick Due, the former mate of a piratical craft, has escaped and is looking for him. Bell is greatly worried, for he has a chart which locates a wonderful treasure chest. Before he can leave the town, Due appears and hires some fishermen to attack Bell and gain possession of the chart. They assault the old man and he is getting the worst of it when Captain Rood and his sweetheart, Ethel, come upon the scene and rout the sailors, taking the old man, who is badly injured, to Ethel's home.

Later he dies and gives to them the chart and instructs them how to find the treasure. Due learns of this, and when Rood advertises for sailors to man his ship, he and the fisherman, who got the worst of the fight, apply for positions and are taken on by the unsuspecting Rood.

Rood and Ethel are married and start out in search of the treasure. Just as they arrive in sight of the land, Due and his men are plotting to take possession of the ship, when the boatswain, who is a friend of Rood's, overhears them, warns Rood, and takes Ethel to a small boat. Rood, with the cook, who is also loyal, tries to reason with Due. Due orders his men to attack the captain, but he locks the door and escapes with his wife. THE FUNNY REGIMENT (Three parts).—The Twins, regular bad men of the regiment, have been condemned to the military prison, and it goes much against the grain of the kind-hearted Captain Hurluret to see these poor fellows confined to their cells. His leniency toward them, however, is speedily taken advantage of with most amusing results.

Consequently, when the General of the regiment, another kind-hearted officer, comes to inspect the barracks, he finds that the regiment are all heartily enjoying themselves and that breach of the rules and regulations is rife. He reproves the Captain, but the latter merely replies that he cares not for the rules and regulations, as his ambition is not promotion, but to be beloved by his men. Under such an officer the men would boldly court, without fear, the death that lurks in waiting for them. Truly, the Captain's ambition is realized, for his men love him with all their hearts.

The guests are just beginning to take their leave, when the doctor is called to attend Baron Dascole, who is dying in a neighboring town. This will necessitate the doctor remaining away for the balance of the night. The guests have all departed. The house is in darkness, but there in the moonlight a man in evening dress is patiently waiting for a signal. He is Viscount George, who had slipped a note to the doctor's wife while at the reception, and she in return gave her consent. The doctor's car, having met with an accident, necessitates him to return home. The thief of love advances cautiously. The half-open doors close silently behind him. The soft carpets deaden his footsteps. The guilty wife is awaiting him. But the door creaks. The unexpected noise catches the ears of the Viscount, someone has entered and is approaching cautiously. In vain does the Viscount attempt to flee: the man grasps him by the throat. The man is Dr. Roberts, who has returned, and noticing the door open, thinks a thief is in the house. He arms himself to kill. The light reveals a gentleman. The doctor is startled to find that he is face to face with Viscount George. A suspicion comes over him that this man cannot be in his house for any other reason than one.

Laura has been aroused by the noise. She listens and a realization of the truth comes over her of what she had suspicion of for some time past. She realizes her happiness is destroyed and the peace of her family at stake. Every tie of family affection will be broken.

After a short hesitation on the threshhold of sacrifice, she rushes to her mother's room. Her mother, as pale as death, stands with tears in her eyes. Thunderstruck at the anguish of the moment, Laura no longer hesitates. She confronts the two men and confesses to her angered father that the viscount has come for her. BLIND FAITH (Hepworth, Ltd.—2 parts).—Molly is the blind daughter of a gold seeker and the two live in a log cabin in a small mining town. In spite of her affliction Molly is able to take care of their home and attend to all the necessary duties about the cabin. During the greater part of the day, her father is off in quest of the precious metal and Molly is consequently left alone. One day she finds it necessary to leave the cabin for a short time and scarcely had she closed the door behind her, when a bandit entered the hut. While he was searching for the gold her father enters and a desperate struggle ensues. The older man's strength soon gives out and the bandit overpowers him. The daughter then enters and meets the stranger as he is about to depart. He does not know that she is blind and backs away from her. She stumbles over her father's body and, bending over him, finds that he is dead. She then realizes that the other person in the room must have committed the murderous deed. She attempts to attack him, but he easily evades her. Finding it impossible to locate his whereabouts in the room, she blocks the door and so prevents his escape through that source. His only chance is through the window. It is a long drop from the window to the ground and it is while he is balancing himself for the drop that the girl grabs him by the hand and feels that one of the fingers of his left hand is broken. Her vain attempt to capture him causes the bandit to laugh. The broken finger and the sound of his cruel laugh are the only clues which the unfortunate girl has to her father's murderer.

Remorse soon overcomes the murderer and he is haunted by the terrible hatred in the girl's blind eyes. Not a day passes that the girl does not wend her way to her father's grave in the woods, there to place flowers and offer a prayer. One day, six months later, a doctor happens to be passing through the village, sees the girl and becomes interested in her case. He tells her that he can restore her sight and she is overcome with joy and consents to start immediately for the town where Dr. Wainright lives. A subscription is taken up among the townspeople, who are only too willing to aid the girl. After months of treatment, the time for the final test arrives. The bandages are removed and, behold, she can see. She then makes her home with the doctor and his wife and becomes a favorite with all their friends. When the Wainrights receive an invitation to spend a week at a house party at Bletchley Towers, Molly, of course, is included.

After the first day's sport, the men return and are introduced to the new arrivals. Fate brings the one-time bandit to the house party and he immediately recognizes Molly. During the course of the evening, he has provocation to give way to a hearty laugh and Molly is startled. When and where had she heard that same laugh? At last it dawns upon her that her father's slayer is before her. The broken finger on his left hand is the only remaining clue that she has and she makes up her mind to find out if this man has a broken finger. She pretends to be able to tell fortunes by reading the palm and when it becomes time for the suspected one to have his palm read, he extends his right. Molly asks for his other hand, but he refuses and leaves the room. Now, positive of her father's murderer, she informs the police. A private theatrical, called "Whom the Cap Fits" is arranged for. At one end of the room, the exact scene as took place when her father met his death, is enacted and the murderer breaks down and begs for mercy. The police enter and place him under arrest. An examination shows that one of the fingers on the left hand is broken.

INTER-CONTINENT FILM CO.

HER LIFE FOR LIBERTY (Three parts).—The first scenes are in a modern Italian village; and the drama is related by an old bagpiper and concerns himself. His sister and father are his neighbors during the eventful days of 1861-62. After the prologue the village occupied by the dissolute Bourbon soldiers is shown. Carola, the sister, is the pride of the countryside. When three semi-intoxicated soldiers attempt to insult her, she rushes to her father. He grabs his gun and rushes down into the courtyard, where he meets the fire from one of the soldier's guns. The brother is away with fellow Garibaldians while Carola is left alone with the body of her dead father. The brother returns with his detachment of "red-shirters" and promptly routs the representatives of the hated Bourbon monarch. But soon a larger detachment of Bourbons is sent to the village. Their feelings stirred to a boiling degree by the death of Carola's father, the villagers give battle to the Bourbons, but the regular soldiers outnumber them, and they seek a vantage point in the old church, where a three-days' attack takes place. The leader of the Garibaldians realizes that they will have to surrender or starve unless assistance can be secured from the neighboring city of Caserta, but the attempt to secure this assistance means almost certain death to the messenger. The leader suggests this, but remarks that hardly any one present would care to take such a risk. But Carola surprises all of them by promptly volunteering to go. The leader throws a rifle over Carola's shoulder and, after being lowered on a rope for a distance of nearly one hundred and fifty feet, Carola gains the roadway in the rear of the church, but she is seen by some of the Bourbons. She does not stop. One of the bullets strikes her in the leg, but despite the great pain she struggles onward and finally reaches a small house on the outskirts of the neighboring city, where her cry for help is answered by a fellow countrywoman, who opens the door, which had been securely locked against the intruders. The woman sees Carola's wound and is about to alleviate the pain when Carola stops her, saying that there is no time for that, her neighbors in the church must be rescued. The woman heeds the advice and, with a revolver in her hand, rushes to the center of the city, where she informs the Garibaldians. Stopping at the house of the woman on their way to the besieged church they find Carola on the floor, dead.

The Garibaldians rush forward and surprise the Bourbons with the ferocity of their attack. In the street encounter the Bourbons lose and in the final stand at the church they are completely routed and they flee along the Volturno river to safety. The besieged welcome their saviors with vehement thanks. Carola's brother rushes up to them to inquire of his sister, and the women point in the direction from which they have come. The brother and the women lead the natives to the house and there they find the body of Carola. Removing their hats and kneeling in prayer they weep as they say a benediction over the noble girl who had sacrificed her life for them.

APEX.

FROM THE GUTTER TO THE FOOTLIGHTS (Five parts).—John Brenton, a well-known impresario, witnesses some wonderful dancing by Younita, an Italian girl, who earns a precarious living dancing in the streets with Reno, a Neapolitan organ-grinder. The impresario is much impressed. Approaching the girl, he hands her his card, inviting her to call and see him at the theater. Younita thinks over Brenton's offer. She is tired of her life with Reno, and in the impresario she sees a chance of self-advancement. She tells Reno that she intends to leave him and become a stage dancer. The man laughs, but seeing the girl is in earnest, and knowing that if she carried out her threat he would be ruined, seizes her, and drawing his knife, hisses in her ear: "Younita, if you ever leave the organ, I will surely kill you!" He flings her to the floor, and leaves. Younita follows him to the club in a crypt situated at Saffron Hill. She knows that while Reno lives she will never be able to gratify her ambition to become a stage dancer. She concocts a fiendish scheme, and makes a tool of Giovanni, who loves her. Urged on by the girl, Giovanni quarrels with Reno, and the men fight with knives. During the fight Younita whispers in Giovanni's ear, "Kill him, Giovanni, and I am yours forever." Reno is killed, and Giovanni is arrested. As he is led out Younita shrugs her shoulders and laughs. "Poor fool," she says, "but he has served my purpose."

Giovanni is sentenced to prison for life, but is firm in the belief that Younita will always be true to him. Through the influence of the impresario, Younita obtains an engagement on the stage. Younita now becomes a star and has, to further her advancement, fascinated Dick, the son of the impresario. Meanwhile Giovanni languishing in prison, is sustained by the belief that Younita still loves him. He makes a bid for freedom. Younita soon tires of Dick and favors Count Vercini, a wealthy man. Dick takes his conge very badly and threatens both Younita and the Count. Giovanni by a daring ruse has eluded his pursuers. He procures a change of clothing, and succeeds in reaching London. Crossing Kingsway, he is startled to see a poster of Younita outside the theater. He tries to see her, but is refused admittance by the doorkeeper. Hanging about outside, he sees her and Vercini emerge from the stage door. Giovanni is enraged. Is this the woman for whom he had suffered, receiving the caresses of another man? He follows them home and witnesses love-making between Younita and the Count. Giovanni's hot southern blood is aroused. He determines to kill the woman who has so deceived him. He reaches Younita while she is alone in her boudoir. He is about to kill her. Then she lies, that she is in the power of Vercini and dare not offend him, but that she still loves Giovanni. The lie pacifies the Italian. Younita makes an excuse for leaving the room. She then writes a letter to Vercini, warning him of Giovanni.

Dick has decided to have it out with Vercini for stealing Younita from him. He reaches the Count's flat and is admitted by the valet. Meanwhile Giovanni, believing that Vercini really has hold over Younita, determines to kill the Count. He gains an entrance to the house in a clever way, and witnesses Dick's discomfiture at the hands of Vercini, overheard by the valet. Unseen by anyone, Giovanni has secreted himself in Vercini's study. The Count enters, smiling at his triumph over Dick, sits down and lights a cigarette. He does not hear the stealthy movement behind him. In a moment he is in Giovanni's grip, and is slowly throttled to death. Then Giovanni, after committing this terrible crime, finds a letter which proves the wicked duplicity of Younita. The letter reads:

"My dearest Count—Beware of a mad Italian—Giovanni—who served my purpose some time ago. I fear he may attempt to harm you. With all my love, Your own, Younita."

For a moment Giovanni is stunned. Then his love for the woman turns to hatred. He vows to rid the world of such a wrecker of men. The body of Vercini is discovered by the valet, who informs the police. On circumstantial evidence Dick is arrested for the murder. Giovanni hearing of Dick's arrest, and having a well-thought-out plan to kill Younita, writes a confession that will clear Dick. Then he makes his way to the theater where Younita is appearing, and enters the gallery. In her dressing-room Younita, surrounded by her admirers, is at the zenith of her triumph. Giovanni in the front row of the gallery is watching; watching for the rise of the curtain. It comes at last and Younita, greeted by roars of applause, appears on the stage. Giovanni watches, fascinated, while Younita dances a weird fantastic dance. Bouquets are flung on the stage. Smiling and triumphant, she takes her last call. Then in the gallery Giovanni's graven figure breaks the action. Drawing a revolver from his pocket, he levels it and fires. A hush. Younita reels and falls dead on the stage. The infuriated audience rush at Giovanni, but he flings them off, and springing on to the parapet of the gallery, leaps wildly, and falls, dying, by the body of the woman for whom he had suffered so much. Dragging himself toward the dancer's body, he falls dead over it, as the curtain descends.

IN THE PYTHONS' DEN (Three Parts).—At a military ball in India, Prince Houssein forces his attentions upon the wife of Captain Dare and is severely reprimanded. His Eastern blood craves for revenge, and with a cunning characteristic of his race, he sets out to attain this in a diabolical manner. A forged note is the means of getting his victim in his power, and when Captain Dare learns of his wife's abduction, his anguish can be readily imagined. The colonel of the regiment is informed of the facts, and without delay a search party of Gourkas is sent out to trace Mrs. Dare.

The palace of Prince Houssein, which is almost inaccessible, is discovered to be the prison of the stolen wife, and in the endeavor to rescue her, Captain Dare is captured, and his sergeant shot. He is taken before the delighted Prince, who gloats over the mortification of the unhappy husband and wife. Mrs. Dare enlists the services of an Indian maid, who enables her to free her husband. Their freedom, however, is short lived. They are recaptured and imprisoned, and Prince Houssein determines to rid himself of Captain Dare by the easy but dastardly method of chaining him to a stake in a den of pythons. Meanwhile, however, the search party are making a determined attack on the palace, while the prince and his retinue are watching the agonies of the gallant captain.

The snakes are curled around his body and his strength is fast failing.

Shots ring out and the trusty Gourkas completely overpower the bodyguard and attendants. Prince Houssein is shot and falls wounded into the arena. The pythons leave their intended victim and attack Houssein, who meets his death in the inhuman manner which he had prepared for his enemy. Mrs. Dare releases her husband and the now happy pair leave the palace, to be escorted to barracks by the faithful Gourkas.

becomes famous. At her first performance she receives flowers from a large number of admirers, and long applause, but the memory of her father comes to her suddenly and that recollection takes away the joy of her triumph.

One evening while she is eating on the terrace of a hotel surrounded by ardent admirers, Marjorie is surprised at the sight of a young man, sad and pale like herself, who is observing her with a languid look. The pale young man is the Prince Arthur of Wallerstein, the son of the Grand Duke, who has come to the Riviera to recuperate from a long illness, under the name of Count L'Estrange. Surprised by the divine beauty and charm of Marjorie, he is a constant visitor at the theater.

One morning they chance to meet and immediately they understand each other and a sense of sympathy seems to envelop their souls. They gaze into each other's eyes and seal their unspoken troth by a lingering kiss. From that day on their love becomes more intense and soon they are married. On board a ship the living apparition of the villain, Swayne, appears before them. Marjorie faints. Arthur calls for help and in the meanwhile Swayne approaches Marjorie, begging for her pardon and love. She repulses him violently, and just at that instant Arthur returns. Swayne, to avenge himself, advises the Prince's country that the Prince amuses himself with sweet woman while the Duchy is in danger, and the Duke of Wallenstein recalls his son home. While Marjorie and Arthur are together at the hotel the message arrives, and his wife finds out who is her husband. She realizes then that she could not hide her true name any longer, and Colonel Theubner, an old friend of her poor father, tells the Prince the truth.

She gets up and departs like a crazy person, and a few days later she returns to the theater which she had left. Arthur, through the Colonel, learns Elsa's history and the reason why she is compelled to go upon the stage, but in spite of this information he continues to look for her. He finds her, pale and trembling. His eyes fixed upon her from his box in the theater. Suddenly Elsa observes his look. She becomes pale, trembles, and tries to control herself, but drops to the floor. The curtain falls; the Prince hurries to her and while he feels her getting cold in his arms, he hears these feeble words: "But my love shall never die." Poor Elsa, after so many troubles and anxieties, had taken poison, as she wished to die for him upon the stage that brought her so much applause.

WORLD'S LEADER FEATURES

SHADOWS OF SIN (Three parts).—Erna, the daughter of a very poor but happy working family, is seated at breakfast with her parents, when Ernest, her sweetheart, calls to accompany her to business, a practice he has indulged in for some time past. This accomplished, we are shown the interior of a workroom, where we see the young girl sitting industriously at her work, when the door opens and the principal, accompanied by the manageress, enters. He critically surveys the figure of every girl until his glance falls upon Erna, whom he bids with an elegant gesture, to follow him to his room. She is told that the showroom lady is ill, and that she has been selected to fill the vacancy. Overjoyed at her enchantment, Erna readily consents.

The following day the sales are having a busy time and among the buyers is one, a man of notorious character, who is making various purchases for his many lady friends. He is enamoured with Erna's beauty and determines to gain her affections, so in a benignant manner he hands her a note which reads, "You are worthy of a better position. Meet me tonight at the Cafe Royal at 9 o'clock and we can talk matters over. Ask for Baron Stein." Erna's experience of the world is indeed little and she agrees to go. At the appointed hour the Baron is pacing to and fro until his eyes are set on a beautiful girl who is seen hesitatingly approaching him. It is Erna. Together they partake of a little refreshment and Stein is successful in his endeavors. He has portrayed to her a glorious future, a mansion to live in, fine clothes, plenty of jewels and she will shortly become his bride.

Suddenly her thoughts are turned to home and in her excitement a dazed feeling comes over her. There appears before her visions of three she has forgotten, her parents and her lover. Each appeal for her return, but in vain. A short letter is sent, saying she has decided to marry a rich man, for the luxuries his money could buy.

The poor parents are stricken with grief. They find it hard to realize that their only child refused them in order to gain the approvals of a rich man. Erna had meanwhile commenced a new life. Dressed like a princess, she accompanies her new friend to the cafes, where the fame of her beauty soon spreads. A few months elapse and the two are one evening enjoying an exhibition of orinetal dancing, when Richard Clement enters. He is described as an engineer and is also of a wild character. He too is charmed with Erna's beauty and determines at all costs that he will speak to her.

Fortune, however, favors him, for the Baron meets a friend who wishes to speak confidentially with him for a few moments. He politely asks the engineer, who stands near by, to entertain his fiancee, which invitation is very willingly complied with. About a week after, Erna is sitting alone in her boudoir when her servant announces a visitor, Richard Clement. He congratulates himself on having found the lady alone and with a seemingly sempiternal smile, he endeavors to emulate her lover. Drawing himself close to her, he places his arm around her neck and is about to kiss her when he is hurled backward by Baron Stein, who had entered at the critical moment.

The engineer readily makes his departure, leaving Erna and the Baron face to face. Angered by his bride's shameful action, he hands the girl her jewels and bids her to quit his house. Erna pleads for forgiveness, but the pangs of animosity aroused within the Baron are great and her pleadings are futile. She now seeks Richard Clement, who gladly receives her, but her happy days are ended. The engineer is a heavy gambler, and by large speculations is practically left penniless. He demands Erna's jewels to meet his debts, which she gives to him, but not with a free heart. She now begins to realize that she stands on the brink of an endless abyss and thinks of her poor parents and wonders shall she return. Yes, she will, and throwing her cloak around her, she begins her journey.

Worn and haggard, Erna eventually reaches the old cottage and entering she falls into her aged mother's arms, who overcome with joy and emotion, sinks into a chair, wiping the tears from her eyes. Ernest, the lover she had once forsaken, is deeply touched, but the father will not condescend to forgive the great wrong she has done. "Out of my house," he cries, and in spite of the pitiful appeals of the mother and Ernest, she is forced to make her exit. Mad with grief, she hastens to expiate her sin by death and is about to throw herself in front of an incoming train when Ernest, who has followed her, draws her back in the nick of time. He leads her to her parents again and amid a scene of intense pathos, she eventually obtains the desired forgiveness.

DAVID GARRICK (Three parts).—Ada Ingot, the lovely daughter of a well-known and wealthy city merchant, although kept in seclusion, usual to the times, is madly in love with the popular actor, and in her father's beautiful home at Marylebone Fields, has ever before her his photograph. Lord Fareleigh, having gained her father's permission, is a suitor for Ada Ingot's hand, and forces his attentions, but is repulsed, and finding that his rival is the celebrated actor, David Garrick, stamps upon his treasured photograph. Ada is indignant, Lord Fareleigh leaves, and she pleads with her father to take her to Drury Lane Theater, to see her unsuspecting lover, Garrick, in "Richard the Third." Adamant at first, her father finally consents. Ada is overjoyed and embraces her lover's photograph.

Ada Ingot, with her father and Lord Fareleigh, enter to witness the play. The curtain rises, and we then see enacted the great historic battle scenes of "Richard the Third," with David Garrick as King Richard. The curtain falls and Ada Ingot, full of excitement, is seen to throw a bouquet to Dave Garrick, who is overwhelmed by her beauty. After the performance Garrick retires to his dressing-room, embracing his bouquet, having fallen desperately in love with the lady in the box. He removes his make-up, etc., and is preparing to leave, when he receives a visit from Ada Ingot's father, whom he does not know. Mr. Ingot has come to ask Garrick a great favor. "My daughter has fallen madly in love with you, Mr. Garrick; I must cure her. Will you help me?" David Garrick is asked to attend a dinner given in his honor, and to become apparently intoxicated, in order to disgust Mr. Ingot's daughter. Not knowing that the lady is his fair admirer of the box, who has given him the bouquet, Garrick consents. Mr. Ingot exits with profuse thanks, when Lord Fareleigh enters the dressing-room, and challenges Garrick to a duel for the hand of the lady who has given Garrick the flowers. Garrick accepts the challenge, and the appointment is made for the same night, Garrick remembering that beforehand he has a dinner party to attend and play a part.

The host, Mr. Ingot, is entertaining his guests (a very strange lot of people) when David Garrick is announced. He is introduced all around, and lastly to the daughter of the house, Ada Ingot. He is astonished to find she is none other than the lady of the box, with whom he is madly in love. Full of remorse, he must, however, keep his promise to her father, and during dinner, in a wonderfully realistic scene, showing what a consummate actor Garrick was, he pretends to get drunk, and so violent are his gestures, that at last Ada Ingot, who is broken-hearted at his behavior, orders him out of the house. Garrick is overcome with grief, but having given his word, continues his drunken scene, and eventually leaves the house in disgrace. Before doing so he learns that Lord Fareleigh, with whom he has to fight the duel that evening, is Ada Ingot's suitor. When the moon is at its height, the rivals meet, and, with rapiers proceed with the duel. In the midst of the fight Ada Ingot (who has heard of the duel, and that of Garrick's only feigned drunkenness at the dinner) appears upon the scene with her father. Garrick has just disarmed Lord Fareleigh, and, in returning him his rapier, spares his life. David Garrick asks for Ada Ingot's hand, her father consents, and the charming romance comes to a close.

THE BRIDE OF LAMMERMOOR (Three parts).—The picture opens with Lord Allen Ravenswood, and his only son, Edgar, living in the ruined tower of Wolf's Crag, close by the boundary of their estate. They are awaiting the action of the Privy Council in their suit against Sir William Ashton to regain Ravenswood Castle, their rightful home. Word comes that the action has been decided against them, and Lord Allen Ravenswood dies, swearing vengeance against Sir William Ashton and his family. His son, Edgar, now Lord Ravenswood, reiterates his father's oath, and swears eternal enmity to the House of Ashton. Lucy, the daughter of Sir William Ashton, while walking with her father in the Ravenswood estate, visits Alice, an old retainer of the Ravenswood family. The old woman cautions her against the vengeance of the Ravenswoods, saying that they never forget. Returning to the castle, they are attacked by robbers. The attack is witnessed by Lord Ravenswood, whose heroic and prompt action disperses the highwaymen, thereby saving Sir William Ashton and Lucy from the miscreants. Edgar revives Lucy, and as they look into each other's eyes, they realize that they love. Sir William Ashton tries to thank Edgar, not knowing who he is, but Edgar refuses his thanks, asserting that he is Edgar, Lord Ravenswood. Edgar's heroism, however, inspires Sir William Ashton with a friendly feeling toward him, and thus the first part of the production closes. A week elapses between the first and second part, and we again see Lucy and her father walking in the estate of Ravenswood Castle. They are overtaken by a storm, and are compelled to seek shelter in Wolf's Crag, the present home of Edgar. During this meeting, the admiration of Sir William Ashton and the love of his daughter for Edgar is increased greatly. They accept Edgar's hospitality for the night. The next morning, Lucy and her father accompanied by Edgar, leave Wolf's Crag for Ravenswood Castle. An old servant of Edgar's reminds him of the family legend of the Ravenswood. Edgar laughs off the old man's warning, however, and goes with Sir William Ashton and his daughter to Ravenswood Castle. Prior to their arrival, Lady Ashton, Lucy's mother, has promised the hand of her daughter to Buckland, Lord Carrington, a noble of wealth, whose position and money appeal to the avaricious Lady Ashton. Upon the arrival of Lucy, her father and Edgar at the castle, she is very much angered at her daughter's association with Edgar, whom she terms a "beggarly Jacobite," and orders him from the estate. She then informs Lucy and her father of her promise to Lord Carrington. Prior to Edgar's departure from Ravenswood Castle, he writes Lucy a note, informing her that he is about to depart for London to plead his cause before the House of Lords. He begs her to be true to him until his return, and she answers his letter, saying that she will be true. The second part of the play ends with Lucy sitting at the window, awaiting the return of her love.

Three months elapse between the second and third part of the production. Sir William Ashton receives word that the House of Lords has decided against him, and that Ravenswood Castle rightfully belongs to Edgar. Lady Ashton is now even more anxious to marry her daughter to Lord Carrington, and enters into a plot with one of the servants to keep Lucy from sending any letters to Edgar, or from receiving any from him. In this she is successful, and Lucy is led to believe that Edgar is untrue to her; she is heart-broken. It is then an easy task for Lady Ashton to coerce her into a marriage with Lord Carrington. Just as the forced ceremony is at an end, and as friends are congratulating the heart-broken bride, the doors are thrown open, and Edgar pushes his way in. Lucy starts to rush into his arms, but is held back by Lord Carrington, and as Edgar realizes that in winning back his estate he has lost all that is dear to him in the world he throws his glove in Lord Carrington's face, and rushes from the castle. Lucy collapses and is carried to her boudoir by Lord Carrington, where he revives her. As she again regains consciousness, she realizes the terrible wrong that has been done her, and overcome by anger and remorse falls dead. The third and last part of this picture ends with Edgar, Lord Ravenswood, bidding good-bye to his steed and to his sword, walking into the Kelpie's Flow, where we see him engulfed by the quick sands that are ever ready for a victim.

MARY MAGDALENE (Three parts).—The story opens with Mary Magdalene as a notorious courtesan of Caperneum. She has two principal lovers, Syrius Superbus (a Roman, living in Caperneum, who is married to Portia, a follower of Christ), and Judas Iscariot. Canis Proculus, a Roman noble, coming to visit Syrius, meets Mary at one of her bachanalian orgies on her roof top and falls in love with her. She returns his affection and casts aside both Judas and Syrius, who turn their hatred on Canis as the result. After a week of happiness, one day when Canis is away, Mary Magdalene sees Christ and is overcome by his magnetism. Influenced by Portia she decides to forsake her sinful life and follows Christ. In the meantime, Canis has told Syrius that he wishes to marry Mary, and Syrius determines to prevent this at any cost. Judas finds that Mary is following Christ to Jerusalem, so he and Syrius decide to go with them without proclaiming their identity, and Syrius writes a letter to Canis, telling him that Mary is unfaithful and has gone away with him (Syrius). One day, Mary looking out her window, sees Canis arrive at Jerusalem and he sees her; they meet, but she tells him she can never become his wife until he believes in Christ.

Judas and Syrius, angered at Mary's repeated rejections of their overtures, and believing that this is due to a material love they fancy she has for Christ (instead of a spiritual love) determine to betray the Master. They obtain a warrant from Pilate, find Christ in the Garden of Gethsemane, and with Caiaphas, the High Priest, succeed in arresting Him. Mary hears of this and rushes to the barracks, warns Canis, who comes out with his soldiers to stop the outrages. Seeing the warrant of Pilate for Christ's arrest, Canis realizes that force is useless and decides to appeal to Pilate, who is his friend. Pilate promises to do what he can to save the Master and Canis returns to Mary, only to find she has left the house. While sitting waiting for her, a spiritual voice comes to him, which seems to be the voice of Christ, and which says, "Seek for Mary in the Garden of Gethsemane." He rushes out and gathering a body of soldiers makes his way as quickly as possible to the garden.

In the meantime Mary has gone to the garden to assuage her grief and has been found there by Syrius, who tries to persuade her to run away with him on condition of his trying to save the Master. Mary refuses and Syrius angered beyond measure urges the crowd to attack her as a follower of the Nazarene. Just as they are about to tear her to pieces, Canis rushes in with his men and tearing Syrius's sword from his hands, kills the latter with it. He then tells Mary that he believes that Christ had led him to her and that he now believes in Him. Protected by the soldiers, he leads Mary away. The story ends with a short vision of the hanging of Judas, and the progress of Canis and Mary up the hill of Calvary, with the three crosses showing on the top of the hills.

ECLECTIC.

JOSEPH'S TRIALS IN EGYPT (Three parts—Feb. 1).—Joseph, the favorite son of Jacob, angered his brothers when he told them that in a dream he saw himself made ruler over them. They went to feed their flocks in Dothan, where Joseph found them. And when they saw him, they conspired against him and cast him into a pit. But Judah, seeing a caravan approaching, persuaded his brothers to sell him to the Ishmaelites, who took him down to Egypt. The brothers then returned to their father and showed him Joseph's coat, which they had dipped in blood. So Jacob was led to believe that his son was devoured by a wild beast. The Ishmaelites sold Joseph to Putiphar, an officer of Pharaoh's. Soon after, Putiphar's wife became enamoured with Joseph and tempted him. But he resisted her approaches and fled, leaving his cloak in her grasp. Angered by his rebuff, she accused Joseph of a grave offense, showing his cloak which he had left behind. For this Joseph was cast into prison by Putiphar. It chanced that Pharaoh's chief butler was also in the dungeon. He told Joseph of a dream, which Joseph interpreted to the butler, saying that it meant that he would soon be restored to favor. This came true the third day and the butler was delivered from prison. It happened that Pharaoh was much disturbed by a dream which even the wise men of Egypt failed to interpret. Remembering Joseph, the butler told Pharaoh of his marvelous power. Joseph was sent for and so pleased the king by his explanations of the dream that he was made ruler over all the land of Egypt.

When the famine was in the land of Canaan, Jacob sent his sons to Egypt to buy corn. Joseph chanced to see his brothers, but they did not recognize him. He accused them of being spies and cast them into prison. They protested their innocence, saying that they were sent by their father, who remained in Canaan with their youngest brother, Benjamin. Joseph sent them to fetch his brother, Benjamin, holding Simeon as hostage for their return. But when they came to their father, Jacob, he would not consent to their taking Benjamin away, saying that he feared he would not be returned again, as Joseph and Simeon were no longer with them. But they persuaded him and returned to Egypt with Benjamin. When Joseph saw his youngest brother, Benjamin, whom he loved, he was much pleased and ordered a feast to be prepared for his brothers. He then revealed himself to them and forgave them for selling him into Egypt. Pharaoh heard of this and told Joseph to send his father and all his brothers and their households that they might dwell in the land. And when Jacob learned that Joseph was indeed living he was comforted and went down into Egypt with his sons. There he was met by Joseph, who was greatly pleased to be again restored to his father. And they lived long in the land of their adoption.

FATALITY AND MYSTERY; OR THE VEIL OF ISIS (Three parts).—Four young girls have their fortunes told by a passing gypsy woman. All take the mystic words unconcernedly, with the exception of Mary, who seems greatly annoyed by the fortune-teller's prophesies, that there is trouble ahead for her. A rich man, named Kriton, returns from a distant country and wants to marry her. But Mary's love has been placed with Albert, who returns her affection. Albert's father is a profligate, and going to the home of his son, demands a part of the 400,000 francs, which he has just received on account for an important firm. Albert refuses, and his father taking advantage of his son's absence from the room, steals the amount he wants, and leaves a card, upon which is written: "You shall not denounce your father." Albert is horror-stricken. Late at night a friend of Albert's takes him to a gambling house, where he (Albert) loses all the money. When this news reaches the ears of his neighbors he is denounced as a disreputable person.

Kriton, who has learned of the losses of Albert, goes to the home of Mary's parents and informs them of the disgrace of Mary's fiance. When Albert arrives he is coldly received and is insulted by Kriton. In response Albert throws his glove in Kriton's face and leaves. In the garden he meets Mary, who tells him that she still loves him. Before leaving her he makes an appointment to meet her that night at the lakeside near the old castle of Ivy. Mary is there at the right hour, but instead of meeting her lover, she is handed an envelope by a messenger, which contains a medal, a gold chain and a little note: "Forgive me, Mary—forgive me forever." The whole truth of the fortune teller then dawns upon her and she runs like a crazy woman along the water's edge. She comes upon fishermen carrying the dead body of her beloved away. She loses her reason in the days that pass, and evening after evening she goes to the lakeside, where she thinks she will meet her lover.

One evening he is approached by Kriton, who happens to be strolling along. He speaks to her, but she does not hear him. She imagines that she sees a phantom standing in the lake telling her to avenge herself. Turning around, she comes face to face with Kriton, whom she kills by stabbing with her hatpin. She then walks into the lake to death.

THE BURNING TRAIN (Two Parts).—Jack Russell is the owner of a travelling circus. Misfortune and hard times are added to by the drinking habits of Jack, who spends what little money he has in the tavern. Stella, his wife, reproves him, and in his anger he is about to strike her, when Anthony, a performer, interferes. Jack is incensed, but has a wholesome respect for Anthony's strength. In revenge, in the dead of night, he decamps, taking with him his little boy, Nello. He becomes intoxicated at an inn, while little Nell is asleep under the table, and goes away in a stupor, forgetting his son. The little chap is found when the inn-keeper closes up, and goes forth into the night. He is found by a mean old woman, who takes him home, and who learns that he is an accomplished violinist. She makes him go out in the streets and play, and his charming personality brings much money into his hands. Meantime, Stella and Anthony have been searching for Nello, and have secured positions with a circus. Nello and the old woman pass the circus and Nello makes such a fuss to go in that she is persuaded to enter. Stella is performing on the trapeze and when her boy sees her he shouts out "Mama! Mama!" Stella leaps to the ground from the dizzy height, but the old woman gathers up Nello and runs out, jumping into a taxicab. Anthony races out after it and calls the police, but the woman eludes them and boards a train, Anthony just managing to catch the last car. The train catches fire and in endeavoring to throw the brake, the engineer cracks the lever. Anthony makes his way under the cars through the fire and smoke and throws on the brakes, stopping the train and rescuing Nello, as well as the frantic passengers, who have been facing death.

A LEAP OF DESPAIR (Four Parts).—Countess Lilian, bored and wearied with the dull monotony of her empty society life, seeks relief and recreation in the saddle upon her famous mount, Phosphorus. To win a wager, she rides this temperamental steed along the parapet of a high bridge, before crowds, who, awe-struck, see her daily with death. A misstep by the horse and she would have crashed earthward several hundred feet below.

Albert Mariam sees the daring deed, and struck by her daring, contrives to meet her. Falling in love with each other, they marry. Soon after, Mariam's mining stocks become worthless. Ruin confronts him.

To save their honest name, the Countess becomes a circus rider, contracting to perform an act in which the previous rider had been killed. The act is a big success, her horse walking up a spiral construction and being suspended in mid-air upon a swinging bridge, with Lilian in the saddle.

Inconstant Albert becomes enamoured of Lottie, a pretty tight-rope walker, and Lilian is neglected. Although suffering keenly, she perforce is obliged to adhere to her contract.

One night she is called, and mounting her horse, does clever equestrian tricks. A host of clowns tumble into the ring and "assist" in the erection of the apparatus for the big event.

Amid thrilling suspense the horse traverses the narrow planking, and after the heavy spiral climb, reaches the bridge. Then follows the flare and flash of the fireworks, the horse unmoved in their midst. The daring rider is about to end the act when she sees her husband and her rival in a stage box. Unnerved, despairing, she and the horse, with a sickening crash, fall to the tanbark floor.

A rush to help the unconscious woman is headed by Albert, who forgets his butterfly passion for Lottie. Lilian is not beyond recovery, and some months later is convalescent. Albert, now a devoted husband, brings a flush of happiness to the pale cheek of the injured woman when he rushes in to tell her that gold having been discovered in the so-thought worthless mines, that he and she will have wealth to grace their reunited love.

AMBROSIO.

FOR THE QUEEN'S HONOR (Three parts).—In their sumptuous headquarters a small faction of the militia of the Kingdom of Ircania are conspiring to dethrone their King, Ircanus III, and they decide to act that night. It is Queen Maritza's birthday and the favored guests are assembled in the magnificent reception room of the Royal chambers. Toward evening they depart and the King retires to his apartment, but Oscar, his aide-de-camp, remains. Beneath her costly robes Queen Maritza hides a woman's heart full of love for Oscar. She invites him into her sitting-room and after spending some time together, he cautiously leaves her on his return to the headquarters.

In the meantime the conspirators have collected a large force ready to attack the palace. Oscar hides behind a bush and sees them advance in boats. The faithful aide-de-camp immediately retraces his way to the palace and informs the astonished King and Queen. Oscar leads them from the palace and in an automobile they flee to safety. While King Ircanus and Queen Maritza are breakfasting the next morning, Oscar arrives with a newspaper account of the rebellion and decides to return and fight in the name of his King. In the land of exile the King finds diversion among boon companions, but Queen Maritza pines for her country and the presence of Oscar. As though her desire were answered, she receives a very encouraging letter from him, stating that the attitude of the people was becoming favorable to them, and that he was on his way to the King.

Oscar arrives with some documents and promises to return that night. He is leaving the house when he receives a note from the Queen requesting him to see her before his departure. The King has just returned, in the early hours of the morning, from a pleasant evening, and while sitting in his study carelessly places his lighted cigar on the edge of his desk. He leaves the room shortly, unaware that it had dropped on the carpeted floor. Queen Maritza and Oscar, who are enjoying their last few moments together, are startled at the sight of flames. They are in a private room adjoining the house, from which escape was shut off by the flames. Oscar, realizing his compromising position, the firemen now ascending on a ladder to the balcony, makes for the burning house, but Queen Maritza with all her strength tries to restrain him. Rather than any suspicion darken the name of his beloved Queen, Oscar prefers death for himself. Locking her in the room, he rushes into the burning house and Queen Maritza falling in a swoon, is rescued by the firemen. Eventually King Ircanus III is restored to his throne, but Queen Maritza, her secret safely locked in her heart, can only offer tears and flowers to the one who sacrificed his life for her honor.

Both of these immense productions have made more money wherever exhibited than any two other Features on record, and have been witnessed by thousands and thousands throughout Europe, Africa and Asia. Together they cost fully half a million dollars to produce and necessitated months of labor and travel. Over 10,000 people and hundreds of horses were employed in the two works and are shown in the respective actions, in addition to a host of distinguished theatrical stars of France and England.

The two plays, as well as all Anglo-American screen plays, will be realistically staged, also enhanced with special music by an augmented orchestra.

Attractive and varied advertising material abundantly provided for each play.

REASONS for MOTIOGRAPH Supremacy

YOU KNOW Something makes the MOTIOGRAPH different

WHAT IS IT?

All machine specifications read much alike; yet, You Know all machines are not alike in the service they give extending over a period of years. There lies the difference, plus—the way the MOTIOGRAPH Makers DO things. IT IS STANDARD. The MOTIOGRAPH standard has always been simply this: make every part of the machine the best; buy only the best material; make it the right way; put it together with skilled labor; test it with utmost care, and then sell this product in a standard, high-class way. This has established the reputation of the MOTIOGRAPH.

As the Operator Looks at it

As the Operator Looks at It

Just notice how easy this operator takes it. He doesn't have to work over a dangerous juice consuming rheostat at furnace heat anymore since the was installed.

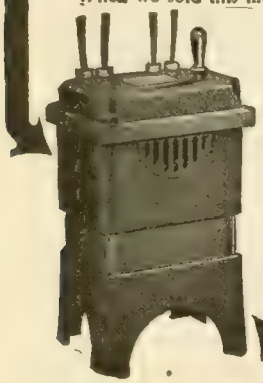
He can control the machine perfectly now with one hand--gets a clearer, whiter, steadier light and can adjust it to any of the three intensities without even the faintest flicker.

When we sold this machine we guaranteed it would absolutely



Cut 2-3 from the Monthly Lighting Bill

That sounded almost too good to be true, but they put one in on our 30 day free trial plan.

Did the machine "make good?" Well, the first month it reduced the bill from $22.70 to $9.24 and they operated more hours and got better light than ever before.

We can do just as well for you regardless of what voltage you are using and if you will send for our little free booklet, we'll explain how we do it.

Remember you are paying the Lighting Company 66 2-3 per cent more than you need to every day you wait.

Nine Big Points IN FAVOR of "Ruy Blas!"

1—William Garwood is Ruy Blas.
2—Three Reels.
3—Story by Victor Hugo, most famous of international authors.
4—Picture story by Elmer Harris, noted playwright, who filmatized "Sapho."
5—Directed by Lucius Henderson, who directed "Sapho."
6—Tells how Ruy Blas rose from valet to Prime Minister; stirring plot!
7—Wonderful settings, wonderful costumes (olden times), wonderful cast. "The Girl the Critic Found," has the female lead.
8—Wonderful lithos, in sizes up to "twenty-four sheets!"
9—Perfect photography.

Think on all of these points as carefully as you can and you will surely order Majestic's "RUY BLAS." Victor Hugo never produced a more fascinating story, or we a better film. You MAY BE in time for a FIRST SHOWING of this great Majestic special if you see the nearest Mutual or Continental office TO-DAY or WRITE 'em to-day.

Money! Money! Money! Florence Roberts' "SAPHO" Is Still Getting It In Loads!

There is no let-up in the big business FLORENCE ROBERTS' "SAPHO" is doing everywhere it is being shown. There is no let-up in the big profits it is earning for wise exhibitors who would rather pay a little more for it than book an inferior film. If you haven't made YOUR "Sapho" killing, ask the Mutual or Continental about it at the same time you order "Ruy Blas."

GET THE NEW MAJESTIC THREE:

"THE THIEF AND THE BOOK," 2 REELS. Drama. Out Sunday, Jan. 25th (final release date). With Billie West, Ernest Joy, Eugene Pallette, Victory Bateman, Florence Crawford, Joe Swickard, Demetrio Mitsoras (the Greek Photoplayer), and Carrie Clark Ward.

NO RELEASE Tuesday, Jan. 27th, due to release of extra reel on Sunday. Jan. 25th, "A RIOT IN RUBEVILLE," Comedy. Out Saturday, Jan. 31st, with Sid DeGrey, Billie West, Harry Carter, Ed Moncrief, Carrie Clark Ward and Howard Davies.

THE PRIZE WINNER!

There's a universal liking for Universal Ike

Augustus Carney, originator of "Alkali Ike" in moving pictures, has become "UNIVERSAL IKE." The new name was suggested by seven different persons out of the hundreds who entered our Name Contest. We offered but one prize, but decided to award special prizes to all who made the same name suggestion as the winner. First prize was awarded to Mr. Ronald C. Manson, 1529 South 7th Street, Terre Haute, Ind., because he not only suggested "UNIVERSAL IKE" but also furnished the idea of using the phrase "There's a universal liking for Universal Ike." The complete list of prize winners follows:

First prize....Ronald C. Manson, Terre Haute, Ind.

Special prize....Employees of "Logan" Picture Show, Logan, O.
Special Prize....Harry Seward, Reading, Pa.
Special prize....Frank C. Miller, Star Theatre, Mason City, Neb.
Special prize....A. M. Welliver, Dreamland Theatre, York, Pa.
Special prize....C. C. Beach, Westminster, Md.
Special prize....Mrs. Lee Matlock, Pomeroy, Wash.

Over 800 suggestions were received, nearly all of which were good. But "Universal Ike" seemed to hit the bullseye, for the committee of judges voted unanimously that it was by far the best.

"Universal Ike" Releases All Ready!

The first "Universal Ike" release will be "Universal Ike Gets a Goat," February 11th. This is sooner than you expected. It means you will have to begin getting your posters and other advertising ready immediately. Take our word for it that Carney is funnier than ever and is going to be a sensational addition to the comedy part of our program!

How the Shepherdess became Model—A dramatic and absorbing story of a woman's rise and a man's downfall

KLEINE-CELIO

(In Two Parts)

(Copyright, 1913, by George Kleine)

"THE ARTIST'S MODEL"

For Release Tuesday, February 17th, 1914

Going into the wilderness for pastoral subjects, the Artist found the Shepherdess. Love grew like the flowers about them, and when he returned to the city, she went as his wife.

The subject made him famous, and the most interested visitor at the Art Museum was the banker, Langley, who, even so, found the model more charming than the picture. The former Shepherdess became a woman of fashion, and slowly but surely dragged the Artist into the financial mire. Broken and dispirited, the Artist went to ruin.

One day he called at Banker Langley's and saw her. He pleaded with her to return, if only for an hour. She refused. The following day he staggered drunkenly into his old studio, and there through the mirror thought he saw a marble bust smile mockingly at him—a bust he had made in the good days gone by. Turning swiftly, he seized the marble to hurl it to the floor, but found the soft, white flesh within his fingers and in her smile the sunrise of a new day.

Facts and Comments

OUR Ohio correspondent relates in a recent issue of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD that an exhibitor in one of the largest cities of the state conceived the idea of executing a brilliant stroke of "showmanship." Hearing that the mayor of the city had gone on a short vacation, he decided to take "a big chance." The mayor, about two years ago, had put the ban on the notorious Petrosini films, which had done so much harm to the good name of the motion picture. The exhibitor in question could not resist the temptation of exhibiting the condemned pictures in the mayor's absence. He not only exhibited the pictures, the report goes, but covered the outside of his theater with lurid posters showing scenes from that so-called feature.

We must confess that we cannot fathom the motives or objects of this exhibitor. The mayor, of course, will return to his duties, and the action of the exhibitor will make him angry not only against the one particular offender but against film men generally. There would be nothing in the mayor's wrath if he did not have just cause to be angry, but in this instance he has good cause for resentment. Whether our exhibitor's action sprang from a boyish desire to get even, or from some other motive, he has done a deplorable thing. It is no excuse for him to say that he wanted to show the absurdity of Ohio censorship. It is true that the Ohio board passed this obnoxious picture. Proof, however, on the absurdities of censorship in general and of the Ohio brand in particular was not lacking. Perhaps the exhibitor is not aware of the fact that the Ohio censorship law gives no immunity from local censorship. He may have to face the mayor and the police, and then he will find that the indorsement of the feature by the state board of censorship is no defense at all to prosecution by the local authorities.

JUSTICE SEABURY, of the New York Supreme Court, has decided as a matter of both fact and law that the exhibition of motion pictures does not take away from the dignity and reputation of any theater, no matter how exalted may be its position in the world of amusements. It is, of course, gratifying to have such a decision from a great court and a wise judge. It is doubly gratifying to know that the court, in arriving at its decision, was guided to some extent by the testimony of theatrical managers, whilom the bitter and disdainful enemies of the motion picture. More than half a dozen of the best-known and most pretentious theaters in this city have had motion picture exhibitions within the last year. Nor were other large cities in the country less hospitable to the motion picture.

With no desire to underestimate the value of this official adjudication, we cannot help pointing out the fact that the motion picture had some time ago won its complete victory in the greatest of all tribunals—the Court of Public Opinion. It has had its accusers and, aye, its defamers in that great court, but by the sheer merits of its case, and by no other influence whatever, it has triumphed over all opposition. It is not likely that the verdict of the Court of Public Opinion will ever be disturbed. After all, the Supreme Court did nothing more than register public approval of the motion picture. In doing so, the Supreme Court has established a precedent which cannot but be helpful to the motion picture in every part of the world. The decision is a distinct encouragement for the producers who specialize in quality.

WE earnestly hope that in the evolution of moving picture terms the horrible phrase "posing for a part" will presently disappear from the language of kinematography. An actor does not "pose" for a moving picture. The yokel who has his first picture taken "poses" in response to the photographer's urgent abjuration to "look pleasant," but an artist does not pose before the camera; he acts, or rather it is supposed that he acts, as his remuneration is fixed on that theory. We are sorry to see the term "pose" used in this foolish way even when the daily press is guilty of it, but when one of our own set uses it we grieve and mourn as we would for an erring brother. Now is the time to stand guard over the cradle of our terminology. Too many foolish and meaningless and inaccurate terms have crept into the etymology of motion pictures, and it seems very hard to weed them out. We must do our share for decent and correct words in the description of all matters peculiar to kinematography.

Five Reels

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

WHAT is the best form of construction in building a multiple-reel photodrama?

A. In a general way, that of the novel.

That means?

A. Much depends upon the author. A certain editor has divided American novelists into three classes, those long on style and short of ideas, those of ideas who lack adequate means of expression, and those who merely think they have something worth while to communicate and could not write about it if they did.

Where does the American novelist of genius come in?

A. He hasn't. It is quite possible that he will find his way to the hearts of people with stories, strong, tender, impassioned, or high-minded through screen portrayal. Novelists of all kinds receive fifteen or twenty per cent. of the profits, even twenty per cent. of the sales on printed versions. Dramatists receive a part of the box office receipts amounting to a substantial portion of the net profits. But no general allotment has been figured out as a rational reward for authors who write stories "strong, tender, impassioned or high-minded" for screen publication. Hence the New Art is crowned with brass or dull lead. One cannot beat out wreaths of gold for conquering producers as long as they do not furnish part of the raw material.

Why have producers not rewarded the author?

A. They have. As much as a quarter of the profits have been paid stage dramatists and large sums to novelists for use of copyright plays and books in screen portrayal, but original stories of high merit for the latter are few and far between, and it is no easy matter to forecast their success. On the other hand, the best paying productions have been wrought by those who had something new to say or could inject new spirit into what has been presented in some other form.

Do stage plays furnish the best plots?

A. Most of them are based on stale plots—more than any other art, that of stage production is narrowed by convention—and depend largely upon character revelation through utterance. Nearly all the classics have been shown in one or two reels, principally because they furnished a large proportion of early material, but also, more recently, because accurate reproduction is not suited to screen purposes. Adherence to anything like the original form involves a tremendous loss of interest in a five-reel photodrama.

Why?

A. In the first place, many fill-gap characters are of use on the stage, who only confuse screen action, where attention must be centered upon principals. What is essential in one form is superfluous in the other. It is a waste of time in photodrama to ticket a lot of people who are often used on the stage to discuss and introduce those principals who gradually emerge and are the more interesting—according to dramatic conventions—because the audience has been prepared for their individuality. Then the stage can only offer a brief and intense phase of life, and this rarely furnishes enough material for a two-reel photodrama. To stretch it by the intervention of commonplace action is to destroy both consistency and tension. Such a multiple reel, lacking what most hold the spectator for two hours, may sell under present conditions, but it is a mistake in the long run. Exhibitors are beginning to discriminate in making up a program.

Do novels furnish better plots?

A. Naturally, because of their greatest scope, and because they are concerned with what leads up to the final issue through schemes of construction well suited to the visualization. They deal with natural outgrowths, the stage with resultant incident. There is more time to work toward the final culmination of interest, to carry the story forward in a constantly ascending line to that culmination. The novel has greater beauty of arrangement, and this goes a long way toward rendering sustained attention easy. A five-reel photodrama must rivet attention to succeed.

Rivet attention on what?

A. The principal characters. Suppose the story concerns a heroine of personality. Show her at once, either in character-revealing relation with others, or, if it is possible to bring about such fascinating disclosure, alone and in self-revelation. The audience is less concerned with what she does at the outset than with what she is. It takes some time for people to make her acquaintance. If it is possible to lay bare her soul in solitary mood, to mirror the dominant traits in her complex nature, those watching the development of her experience will be far more curious to see how it all turns out than if she is misunderstood or a total stranger to them. There is where the personality of the actress becomes important. Who cares what happens to so many lay figures on the screen? Make them live and invest one with sympathetic interest, and the pictured events cease to be tedious, even if they bristle with other faults.

Does not the personality of an actress distract?

A. No. It intensifies the interpretation.

Besides presenting a story so as to command attention, what other criterion is there to test soundness of construction?

A. Logical and connected arrangement. In the absence of high suspense, lucidity will go a long way toward holding interest. Here is where critical judgment comes in—it recognizes what should be immediately shown and what should be postponed in the development. A dramatic way to begin a story is to plunge into a crisis and, later on, to dissolve back to what brought about that crisis. A more lucid way is to begin with what leads up to the high point. As to which method is best depends largely upon the nature of the story to be told, so it is up to the critical judgment of the author to enter upon that arduous undertaking, the achievement of sound construction—that important matter generally eludes the attention of the director.

What makes a good beginning?

A. Strike a keynote of interest, either a fascinating characterization or an incident that will arrest and hold attention through the presentation of a problem to be solved.

What makes a good ending?

A. There is where most plays fail. If there has been anything of importance to show, the only effective climax is a logical result of all that has gone before. If the whole idea of the play is to have hero and heroine embrace at the finish, the end is usually foreseen and the absence of suspense may entirely destroy interest in a five-reel production. Such plays are without distinction and are becoming more and more tiresome. A large number of the multiple reel photodramas recently shown constitute a shapeless mass of incidents with a foregone conclusion of no particular importance. A good test at the end of a five-reel production—no matter what the treatment costs—is to consider the total effect, whether stirring or purifying, and apply the caustic, "What of it?"

The Passing of a Mania

By W. Stephen Bush

IN spite of all our progress we are still subject to fits of hysteria. At such times reason is hurled from its throne and men and women act in obedience to the lower and the baser instincts of their nature. At times the hysteria grows epidemic and develops into a mania. The manias of mankind from witchcraft to heresy make sad reading.

In this present decade, and right here in New York, hysterias and manias are at times carefully nurtured by the yellow journals, notoriously the greatest enemies of American civilization. Hysterias and manias are commercialized by men endowed with keen commercial instincts and unburdened by conscience. Some of these men are in journalism, others in theatrical enterprises and still others have recently entered the motion picture field. The hysteria which but a short time ago was bordering on the maniac stage and which has been shamelessly exploited by the vultures and vampires of society, has become known as the "white slave" hysteria. Happily the hysteria is rapidly passing away and we are even in New York City returning to sane and normal conditions.

A splendid proof of this fact was furnished by the attempt to revive the "white-slave" drama with the aid of a deodorized and partially disinfected version of the most offensive of these hybrid productions. The attempt was a complete and pitiable failure. Although for some unaccountable reason artists of a high order of talent had lent themselves to the production of this unwholesome freak, the play failed to elicit the slightest response of encouragement from the public. The public came in scant numbers and left in a mood of candid disgust. The critics unanimously condemned the play not only because it was poorly built and exceedingly crude in its technique but because it was so frankly nauseating. The promoters of the play realized that the hysteria had died away and felt forced to withdraw the play after a fitful existence of one or two weeks. It is currently reported that the filmed version of the play is laboring under difficulties and that there seems to be no public desire to see the "wonderful photodrama."

Two things ought be considered in connection with this widely discussed topic. First let us ask: What do the people say who really know conditions from sad and practical experience or contact? I would always rather listen to a man or woman who has accomplished something than to a mere theorizer. One witness who can testify from actual observation is worth a ton of all the "sociological and medical societies" devoted to the publication of theories. The testimony, for instance, of a woman like Mrs. Kate Waller Barrett, the President of the National Florence Crittenton Mission, is to the point and worthy of earnest consideration. She has helped hundreds of young women who, wandering through the tragic maze of life, had lost their way in the darkness.

> I have been accustomed to seeing women exploited all my life, and especially to seeing unfortunate girls exploited by unprincipled men and women and by greedy corporations; but in all this blood-sucking I have never seen anything to equal the exploitation of unfortunate girls by so-called philanthropic organizations and uplift movements, such as moving-picture shows, problem plays and so-called saviors of the white slave.

These words contain no flattery for the men who have put the imaginary vileness into films purely for the purposes of gain. The president of the Florence Crittenton Mission is surely competent to speak on the question. Her remarks deal severely but justly, we think, with the growing sect of men and women who imagine that all wholesome restraint, all natural decency and all delicacy of feeling must be sacrificed for the sake of a delusion.

The second thing to be considered is the effect of filmed nastiness on the public mind and on the reputation of the moving picture. In a very able article, one of the great metropolitan dailies deplores the existence and cultivation of the "white-slave myth." There is one sentence in the article which calls for emphatic correction. The writer says:

> As for other aspects of the case, the efforts of the police that might profitably be devoted to the pursuit of "cadets" and other human scum of the masculine species that live off commercialized vice have to be diverted to the censorship of the obscene and revolting "white-slave" films that are used systematically to debauch the minds of the patrons of moving picture theaters.

There is no "systematic debauching" by means of motion picture films dealing with the so-called "white-slave" problem. The worst of all these films was conceived and made by men who are entirely outside the real moving picture pale. None of the organized producers nor any of the well-known feature companies are connected with it in any way whatever. Nor is it correct to say that these films have been used to debauch the minds of the patrons of moving picture theaters. No legitimate photoplay house devoted regularly and exclusively to the exhibition of motion pictures has within our knowledge harbored the worst and latest offense. On the contrary, several of the reputable producers have gone on record as protesting against such films. One of them said emphatically that no such "film would ever come out of his studio." The navigators on the Stygian pool are all by themselves and none is anxious to keep them company.

We know, furthermore, that The Moving Picture World has been fully sustained by the decent sentiment within the industry in its decided stand against the exploitation of a "white-slave" hysteria by means of the motion picture.

The motion picture has come into the world for the purpose of educating and humanizing people, not for the purpose of the better understanding of conditions in a sewer. The motion picture has survived worse attacks and more insidious foes than ever the "white-slave" films and it will survive this latest assault as well. The hysteria being now in its moribund state and therefore a poor subject for commercialization will presently fade away. The chances are that the men and the forces that were behind this latest invasion will disappear with the craze. They will find to their cost that their future efforts will always be viewed with suspicion and that their path will be hard and thorny. They have stirred up all the imps of censorship and have deliberately attempted to besmirch the good fame of the motion picture.

The clear inference suggested by the situation is this: As education and enlightenment are advancing the chance of making money by appealing to a popular delusion are getting constantly less. Theatrical managers have discovered this at heavy expense in New York as well as elsewhere. The film men have been much wiser in this respect than the magnates of the theater, for their attitude has always been more respectful toward public taste and public intelligence. The exception of recent days has but proved the rule. We earnestly hope that the film producers, with the aid and co-operation of the exhibitors, will continue to take the sound and sensible view, i. e., that it pays better to respect the public than to flout and insult it.

"A Man's Shadow"

Six Part Eclectic Feature.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

A FEATURE of six parts must have more than ordinary merit to make it live. On this theory, I predict a long and successful career for this latest release of the Eclectic Company. I have not seen a better picture in many months, my waning faith in long features has been revived; this is truly a one hundred per cent. picture. Whether you look at it with the eye of the critic or the eye of the exhibitor, the verdict must be equally flattering to the producer.

Plot and action measure up to the highest standards. The story is taken from one of the most popular works of Jules Mary, a modern French author of no mean ability. The labor of adaptation has been performed with skill and patience by an expert of the screen drama. He has extracted the dramatic values and has woven them into a most fascinating photodrama. Never, for the briefest instant, is there the slightest dragging in the progress of the story; it is full measure, but it never runs over. The end of every part leaves the spectator keyed up to a high pitch of interest; the suspense continues to the very climax, which comes with a flash and a crash like the bursting of an electric storm. The theme which the author has chosen is one which will never lose its spell for the heart of man or woman.

Scene from "A Man's Shadow" (Eclectic).

A very full synopsis of the story has been printed in THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD of January 17th, but it may be well to refer briefly to the dominating motive. A good man yields to a strong temptation and sins. He repents quickly, but his partner in guilt, the more deadly of the species, refuses to join him in his resolve, and her love changes to hate. Upon this one misstep of a good man a vengeful ex-employee rears a diabolical plot for the destruction of the good man, and well nigh accomplishes his wicked purpose. There must be bitter suffering and cruel expiation before full peace is restored to the heart of the offender. Innocent men and women must pay dearly for the weakness and folly of one to whom they had every right to look for protection. The atonement is complete in the end, and the play closes with the union and happiness of the two young souls, who have had their share of sorrow and suffering.

The acting in his play is of the highest type. All the parts were taken by artists of acknowledged standing on the French stage; the poise, the perfect self-control, the pleasant suggestion of reserve powers—all these tests of the true artist revealed themselves with uniform excellence from the main title to the end. It is plain that the director had a wide range of selection and that he chose the most suitable material in strict accordance with even the slightest requirements of each part. One special word of praise is due to the little girl who played the part of Laroque's daughter. The drama exacts great and difficult things of her and she responds to every call. It is marvelous to see a girl of perhaps nine or ten express the emotions of joy and horror and pity and love with such fidelity to nature. A pair of dark witching eyes helped the young artist, but she possesses the brains and the skill and the talent which teach her how to use these eyes.

In one of the early scenes the villain, Luversan, is discharged for dishonesty. The discharge takes place in the presence of all the other employees. The temptation to overacting was there. I know men and women who are paid to act before the camera and who would have torn this tense and terrible situation to rags and tatters by the mortal sin of overacting. The man who played Luversan gave a superb exhibition of artistic restraint and made the scene one of the most telling in the whole play.

The photography was a joy, the settings showed ability to build and to select, the titles were clear and simple and always appeared just when needed. A hundred good titles are taken as a matter of course while one bad mistake stands out like a mountain, and for this reason I want to call special attention to the fact that all titles in this feature are without even the shadow of a fault. A good title builder is one of the best friends of the motion picture and a word of occasional appreciation is surely not out of place. The handling of the court-room scenes showed great originality and will be a most agreeable surprise both to exhibitor and spectator.

Here is something unusual—Andrew Carnegie as an Edison actor. The iron master arrived at the studio January 20, and proceeded at once to post himself upon the duties of an actor, before the Edison Kinetophone.

A handsome library set had been made and Mr. Carnegie took his place beside the table. When he got the word he proceeded to give his lecture in the most business-like way imaginable. He seemed oblivious of the camera and discussed the subject of the distribution of wealth and the obligations which great wealth imposes upon the person as if he were talking to an intimate friend.

The film and record which he made will be exhibited in vaudeville and a record and print will be placed in the archives of the Modern Historic Society.

Marc MacDermott, who was one of the numerous interested spectators, remarked that it was a great pity that Mr. Carnegie had turned his attention to steel and libraries as the stage had lost a great actor. Never had he seen such complete self-possession on the part of a man who faced the camera for the first time.

The group is as follows: Standing from left to right—M. R. Hutchinson, chief engineer of Edison laboratory; J. A. Poynton, secretary to Mr. Carnegie; Horace G. Plimpton, manager Edison studio. Sitting from left to right—Henry Phipps, Andrew Carnegie and Charles Summer Graham.

"The Marriage of Figaro"

(Ambrosio-Kleine).
Released Through General Film Co.
Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

IT was with great pleasure that I viewed, and it is with sincere pleasure that I review "The Marriage of Figaro," a two reel comedy by Ambrosio that will be released through the General Film Company, February 3.

George Kleine, who has the rights in this country and Canada to the films, selected them personally after a private exhibition in the Ambrosio studio, in Italy, and his well known taste for what is finished and pleasing in moving pictures will be amply sustained by this fine Ambrosio subject.

In a measure the story may be termed a sequel to the libretto of Rossini's opera "The Barber of Seville," the same characters in the opera being employed in the photodrama as in the comedy by Beaumarchais, on which the scenario is based. The complexities of the story, which result in delightfully mirthful situations, are always made clear in the films, so that the spectator can follow the action and intrique as intelligently as if he were listening to the spoken drama.

I understand that most of the fine exterior settings were taken in Seville itself, in the grounds of the royal palace—the Alcazar, I think it is called. I have never before viewed so many ravishingly beautiful backgrounds in any single subject. The architecture is distinctly Spanish, with Moorish admixture, the interiors revealing exquisite marble traceries and delicate mosaic work. The costumes are strictly of the period to which the story belongs, and the properties have been chosen with the same nice care and knowledge.

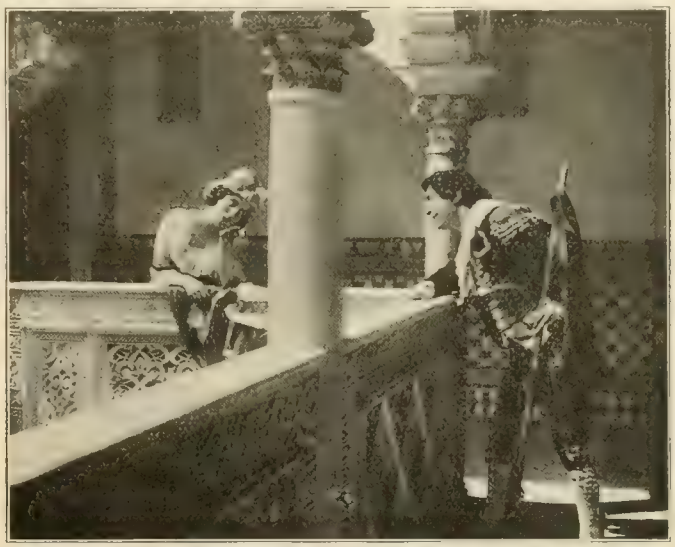
The acting is a positive treat, and the telling situations furnish groups that are well worthy of the brush of an artist. Figaro, the old chaplain Basilio, the high spirited buxom Susanne, the courtly Count and Countess Almaviva, and the lovesick page, Cherubino, amuse and delight us as unctuously as if we saw them in the original flesh. The cleverly laid traps for the count and his tool, Basilio, excite the keenest merriment when they are sprung. To watch the countenance and actions of the count in the scene where Figaro and Susanne are united in marriage is productive of exquisite inward laughter. The pictures tell us of his disappointment, hurt vanity, and the anguish of relinquishment better than any words could express. And this is a deserved tribute to the actor (whose name is unknown), who impersonates the character.

Count Almaviva and his Rosina, as told in "The Barber of Seville," marry and settle down on the count's estates. Figaro, the barber, according to the filmed story, is appointed major domo of the castle in return for his assistance in gaining for the count a wife. Susanne, with whom Figaro is in love, is lady's maid to the countess.

The count seeks diversion to ease the monotony of peaceful married life. He casts his eyes on Susanne, and employs his chaplain Basilio to carry her a love letter. Basilio does so and Susanne chases him from the room, and soon afterwards shows the letter to Figaro and the countess.

The page, Cherubino, loves his mistress. Figaro discovers it, and immediately forms a counterplot to get even with the count. The count leaves for a hunting trip, and on the same day Figaro contrives so that Cherubino and the countess take a walk through the grounds. He then conducts Basilio to the spot and the chaplain rushes off to tell his master. The countess, the page and Susanne are all privy to Figaro's plans, and just as Basilio rushes off Susanne takes the place of the countess by the side of the page. When the angry count reaches the spot, he believes Basilio has grossly blundered and the chaplain sorely puzzled, barely escapes a trouncing.



Scene from "The Marriage of Figaro" (Ambrosio-Kleine).

But Figaro seeks further humiliation for his master. He induces Susanne to answer the count's note, making an appointment at a certain place for the next evening. He then gets the countess and Susanne to exchange dresses on the evening mentioned, each wearing a mask. The count therefore meets his own wife unknowingly and lavishes upon her face and ears many tokens of endearment. While this is going on Basilio rushes up with the information that the page is again walking through the grounds with the countess. The count follows him excitedly to the spot, and discovers that the page's companion is Susanne.

In the midst of his confusion, the countess, dressed as Susanne, approaches and unmasks. The count is utterly confounded, and the countess is stern in her condemnation. She finally agrees to pardon him on the condition that he shall at once consent to the marriage of Figaro and Susanne. This he does, and Basilio performs the ceremony.

The Drama of Heyville

Edison Two-Reel Farce Comedy; Released Through General Film Company.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

EIGHTEEN stars from the Edison regular stock, besides "villagers, members of the band, supers, ushers, etc.," are called upon to interpret Ashley Miller's "roaring farce," and its object, purely that of putting a mixed audience in a good humor, will surely be accomplished. It offers in exaggerated form the struggles of a village dramatic company to present both classic and contemporaneous drama, beginning with "Romeo and Juliet" and concluding with a thrilling war play, "The Union Spy," and, in the latter case, both professional and amateur versions are visualized for contrast in an amusing way, one being as funny as the other.

Scene from "The Drama of Heyville" (Edison).

It happens this way. One of those natural-born producers to be found in almost any small town, in this case "Heyville," is supported by the Demosthenes Dramatic Club in a barn performance of "Romeo and Juliet"—he plays Romeo with a success that sends him to the city for new material. He decides to give a modern play, and has about the same qualifications for putting it before the public that are possessed by the average moving picture director. Heyville is supposed to be one of those towns within easy reach of New York City that are more truly rural than the most remote farming centers, and "Hod," the aspiring producer, actually visits the metropolis to look over the situation.

Scene from "The Drama of Heyville" (Edison).

He invades the Great White Way, and pictures of that noted thoroughfare at night are actually shown, the first I have ever seen in a screen portrayal. He finds a box ticket to a performance of "The Union Spy," and we thereafter see him applauding in the box as well as what is presented to his vision on the stage. It is a supposedly serious rendering of the melodrama by Marc MacDermott, Miriam Nesbit, Harry Linson, Nellie Grant and Augustus Phillips, but it more delicately satirizes the stage than does its imitation. Hod, the producer in embryo, takes voluminous notes from his point of advantage in the box and rewrites the play for home consumption.

He eventually brings it out at Heyville with a tremendous cast, calling for the services of Horace Newman, Bliss Milford, Edwin Clark, May Abbey, Elizabeth Miller, Harry Etynge, Julian Reed, Joseph Wilkes, Margaret McWade, Cora Williams, Joseph Allen and Andy Clark. These artists perform as amateurs so well that their interpretation is masterly. It may be said that never has the entire lot seemed to be more perfectly at home than as barn-storming Heyvillians—possibly this is fine art—that is, of course, to be presumed—and it is also possible that it all seemed to them like the good old days before they were in the movies—it is delightful.

I saw this two-reel comedy where there were others, and they laughed all the way through, some of them sincerely, as will nine-tenths of those in audiences to be thus amused. Another tenth will silently chuckle, will retrospectively chuckle. That one-tenth did the same thing years ago, built the stars, painted the scenery, trained the company and even wrote the play. I do not say that Director Miller belongs to that tenth—no man is obliged to incriminate himself—but there are unmistakable signs in the Heyville farce that he actually did his worst in years gone by, that he wrote a play somewhere in his teens and performed the multiple roles of lead, prompter, manager, scene painter and "angel." How do I know? Well—no matter.

An Interview with A. C. Bromhead

The Energetic Gaumont Manager Talks Interestingly of Conditions Here and Abroad.

MR. A. C. BROMHEAD, of the Gaumont forces, the alter ego of the head of the famous house, has just arrived in New York from Europe. He purposes staying in this country for five or six weeks. To a representative of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD, who saw him at the Gaumont offices in the World's Tower Building, Mr. Bromhead said that he "had not come on any particular business, but just to look around and get better acquainted with conditions."

"I think," continued Mr. Bromhead, "that conditions will soon be about the same on both sides of the Atlantic. Of course, I am speaking more of the English market than of conditions on the Continent. We can learn a good deal from the Americans; they certainly know how to carry on business. There is little we can teach you. We are subject much to the same fluctuations that occur here. The market in England is not as completely open as it was; the craze for exclusives is the cause; perhaps I ought not to use the word craze, for, after all, the exclusive is a good business proposition. I will change the word, and say fashion. Just now the fashion is a bit on the wane on the other side, and we are reverting more to the old style. Not entirely. There will always be a good market for exclusives on the other side, but the feature with more than five reels will not be successful, except where there is a stupendous production. The two and three-reel features seem to be the more popular. It is still difficult to dispose of single reels in quantities; they must be really good if a market is to be found for them. What makes me think that the six and seven-reelers have no longer the drawing power they once possessed is the fact that last summer we had no trouble in getting enormous prices in the best theaters, while this year things are quite different.

"American conditions are always intensely interesting to me; I think your management is very efficient. I have unbounded faith in the future; in England the trend is all toward the big theaters with 2,000 and 2,500 capacity. We have not reached the limit, and there is considerable growth ahead. Great progress is made in other European countries, too, especially in Germany, which is rapidly coming ahead. I think, in the matter of presentation, Europe is a shade ahead of you.

"We are now building the finest studio in England. We have acquired valuable film rights and have contracted with H. G. Wells for the filming rights of his works. As you know, Wells, who is the author of 'The Invisible Man,' is the best-known living English writer next to Kipling. So far, we have only made topical films in England, but now we will go into dramatic production on an ambitious scale. Your country is the largest market to those who are to profit by it to the fullest extent. In England any one who has a good film can always dispose of it at a fair price."

Famous Battles of Napoleon

A Four-Reel Historic Picture Filled with Human Quality, Offered by the Cosmos Film Company.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

ONE sees many battle and war pictures nowadays; but this four-part Cosmos film has qualities much above most of the others, both in its human interest and in the kind of instruction that it gives. It attempts no connected fictional story; but may be termed a collection of heroic details, some of which are well known from illustrations in school books and from famous paintings. Of all these the loveliest are those that deal with the charming Queen of Prussia, Louise. They furnish the prettiest kind of relief to the rougher action, such as the capture and fate of Major Schill and his courageous followers who were carrying on a guerrilla warfare in Stralsund, were captured by Napoleon and shot as rebels. These and many other incidents are acted with that kind of sincerity that makes them little gems; for one must not forget that they are not imaginary, except inasmuch as they are art, for there is a commendable attempt to make the scenes conform to traditions. This reviewer makes no claim of ability to judge the historicity of Napoleon's invasion of Germany in the years 1806-7—but they seem most convincing and are surely good stuff as entertainment. That there is some padding is not astonishing. On its merits, as a whole, the picture is a desirable offering. We might add that it was made by the German Biograph Company and naturally looks on from the German side, which is the world's side when one considers it.

The picture opens with the French invading Germany and gives an animated scene as the army breaks across the frontier. The next big scene is Frederick of Prussia drawing up an ultimatum. It is perfectly done; the king acts royally, and there are fine faces among his ministers. Later Napoleon is shown rejecting the terms. In appearance he is acceptable and the player's acting, as the picture progresses, adds to his effectiveness and makes a good portrayal. One scene in the first reel will stir the sympathy of all. It is the death in battle of the young and romantic looking Prince Louis, and is finely acted and full of natural grace. Following this is a wonderful vision scene in which Napoleon dreams of his troops going to victory at Saalfeld. It is a masterpiece of photographic illusion and stage direction.

There is a group of scenes in reel two dealing with Queen Louise and her patriotic endeavors to help. There is also a beautiful scene in a farmhouse where she has taken refuge with her two sons. All these are acted to give an indication of motherly tenderness which, because of its restraint and sincerity, will move the heart of the audience deeply. In the settings and general handling of these, as well as other like scenes in this offering, there is an art sense which makes them dignified and picturesque. The photography is fair all through; but in many places it is perfect.

A. W. Goodman, manager of the Court Theater, 36 Court street, Binghamton, New York, has taken a lease on the Hippodrome, that city, and will remodel it into a first-class picture house. Mr. Goodman expects to open the house on or about the first of February.

Mexican War Pictures

About Two Reels. The Mutual.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

THE Mutual Film Company has rendered a great service by showing these "Mexican War Pictures." There is no historian like the camera. This glimpse of the struggle going on in our pitiable sister republic to the south is worth all the printed articles in the newspapers and magazines from the day old Diaz left Mexico to this present moment. The Mutual films convince us at once that the trouble in Mexico is neither war nor magnificent. Villa's "army" is at best a band of guerrillas. After viewing the Greek-Bulgarian war pictures, I could not believe that anything lower might exist in the scale of civilized warfare, but these Mexican pictures have added a new though not a bright leaf to history.

I saw General Villa, General Ortega, General Manzillas and other generals mentioned by the gentleman who explained the pictures and I have not a just conception of what a Mexican general looks like. They were all pleased to be kinematographed. Villa and Ortega posed as meekly as any novice before a camera and obediently took off their hats when told to do so by the photographer. The pictures do not portray or claim to portray a battle; they show among other things the conditions in and around Ojinaga after the battle which was fought in and about that town. Ojinaga is just a cluster of houses with a church. It was badly damaged by the soldiers of Villa and the films gave a very good picture of the damage done. The films also showed the badly battered buildings from which the Federals were driven by the Constitutionalists and likewise the trenches that had been dug by the Federals. There was a good view of the police station of Ojinaga and the little Plaza of the stricken town. The police station had been the military headquarters of the Federals. Other things shown on the Mexican side of the Rio Grande were the train of captured guns and ammunition wagons, the review of the "army" before General Villa, the captured Federal prisoners, the wretched refugees on their way to the American side.

Many people, I think, will be more interested in the scenes taken on the American side. The Americans have indeed "intervened," and I earnestly hope these pictures will be shown in Europe in order that the civilized world may be convinced just how America has "intervened." We have "intervened" not with arms, but with bread and shelter for the poor women and children who are dragged along at the end of these trainbands of guerrillas, and we have "intervened" by treating the wounded soldiers of both sides who have sought refuge on the right side of the Rio Grande. The scenes showing how Uncle Sam takes care of all these unfortunates are most touching and instructive. These Mexicans seem to be quite content and all were anxious to get into the pictures. Even in the most civilized methods of modern warfare the element of horror and wretchedness overtops every other aspect.

In the so-called Mexican civil war there is, as these films testify most eloquently, nothing of the glory and glamor of war. The films convince us that the struggle in Mexico is down to the lowest level of human misery and sordidness: a lot of poor peons, more or less badly armed, fighting for they do not know what, and murdering each other like bands of savages. There is no scene of actual fight or murder in the films, but not much imagination is needed to piece out the rest of the story from common rumor and newspaper accounts. These films are the best possible peace arguments. The cameramen, though they always had the best of light, were often hampered in their work by untoward circumstances and this must account for some of the minor defects in the films.

"A Million Bid"

Four-Reel Vitagraph.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

A STRONG play, so admirably treated as to strengthen the original, so well cast that the interpretation is almost beyond criticism, and one treading on the border of a profoundly interesting subject, exploration of the submerged life of the mind. Only the border has been touched because the amount of scientific discovery on this subject is limited and difficult of access. We have only begun to peer into the shadowy depths of the human mind.

Scene from "A Million Bid" (Vitagraph).

The story opens logically with a delightful piece of characterization, that of a selfish wife and mother, whose sole idea of existence is to make an impression by display. To Julia Swayne Gordon falls this role, and her impersonation is masterly. She loses no opportunity to exhibit the cunning vanity of her sex, the weapons of deceit women were once compelled to use in self defense against male brutality, which are still employed for less noble ends. She drives her husband to despair and death by that self-regarding policy which transforms wives from helpmates to hellmates, then makes a white slave of her daughter, by delivering her into the hands of a millionaire husband, for the sole purpose of keeping up appearances. Miss Gordon makes this role so effective that there is a powerful lesson in the play—it is worth while.

The acting in this photodrama is of a high order throughout, and small wonder. I do not recall a Vitagraph production of importance in which more of their stars have been gathered.

The daughter, well interpreted by Anita Stewart, is already in love, but her mother's influence is so powerful that she marries a millionaire and sets sail with him on his yacht, her mother and a number of guests accompanying the bride and groom on this peculiar honeymoon. The yacht is wrecked in a fog; the millionaire owner is struck by a falling chandelier; the bride fails in her heroic attempt to save her husband, and he is left for dead. Nearly all the others escape, and are taken aboard a passing steamer, the mother excepted—she is drowned in attempting to secure her jewels.

The daughter returns to America, marries the man of her choice, bears him children, and is living happily with her second husband, now become an eminent brain specialist, when the first one reappears, in an altered personality, as a patient. He survived the wreck, but the blow on his head and high emotional shock resulted in an alteration of personality, with no remembrance of his past life. A powerful situation is set up when the happy wife recognizes in this patient the man whose restoration to original personality will affect the legitimacy of her children, as well as her own happiness. A great deal is made of this situation, but it might have been even more intense if the wife's thoughts had been laid bare. It is, however, strong enough to inaugurate a suspense that holds tight through the surgical operation performed by the brain specialist upon a man whose restored identity means so much. The satisfactory conclusion is entirely logical and forms an effective climax.

The wreck scenes, especially those showing the interior of the sinking yacht, are among the best ever exhibited on the screen. The direction of this play, that of Ralph Ince, is more than adequate—it is forceful. The entire production is a pronounced success.

Justina Huff

JUSTINA HUFF is somebody's big sister. At that she is just 5 feet 3 inches tall and her authority is only 100 lbs. heavy. Her particular charge is her sister, 3 inches shorter and 1 lb. lighter. They are both in their teens and are adding charm and daintiness to Lubin pictures. Miss Huff is serious in spite of her girlishness, and reads Poe, Hugo and Maeterlinck. She is serious, she says, because it's such a responsibility, this business of life, and she wants to be to the picture public not merely "that slender girl with the aristocratic air," but Justina Huff, who really acts. And she wants to work for that name. From Georgia, Justina Huff came and has been less than a year before the patrons of the animated screen. Mrs. Fiske chose her for one of the dairymaids in "Tess" and Miss Huff made her debut in filmdom in that production. But she didn't have her little sister in that photoplay to look after, so she wasn't really doing herself justice. Miss Huff's hobby is old-fashioned cookery. Nothing delights her more than to envelop herself in a big, businesslike apron and concoct dishes that can be made only by the southern cook. She has been urged by a large distributor to supply their shops with her inimitable jellies and jams, but it is not likely that her work at the Lubin studio will admit of this added effort.

"The Lion and the Mouse."

Unprecedented Hit in Lubin Six-Reel Picturization of Charles Klein's Play—General Film Company's Special Release.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

MOTION picture making as an art most emphatically justifies itself in the new Lubin presentation of "The Lion and the Mouse." There are stories that easily adapt themselves to screen portrayal, while others—and you will find that they are artificial in form even though they be, like Oedipus Tyranus, tremendously human in spirit—refuse to make first class pictures. "The Lion and the Mouse" is of the former. We have a clear memory of the play and it seems to us that on the stage the human bigness of the story was cramped even with all the help that Klein's brilliant dialogue could give it, whereas on the screen untrammeled though voiceless, with the actual capitol at Washington shown and all the other sets and backgrounds far more real than any stage setting could make them seem, the story comes closer to us and the reality of it is more impressive. "This is no stage story," it catches us saying; "it is a page of modern history." Let us say that the reviewer was himself impressed and made a bit uncritical by admiration; yet probably no more critical audience could be found for it than the large but specially invited gathering of picture people who saw it at the American Theater recently, and one and all most enthusiastically indorsed it. The applause was very decided and hearty.

The picture is made greater than the play most by the greater emphasis that it gives to the love story. The stage version, with its dialogue, seemed to be a political situation with a love story to make it real; here, as the human heart really demands, the order is reversed. The political situation is just as clear as in the play; nothing has been lost and much gained by the fact that it is made to serve the love story; for, in turn, the love story made greater makes the political situation more poignant. Poignant it surely is until the happy ending which expectancy is made to hope for but kept uncertain of from the first. It is a wholesome, human, heart-satisfying picture and it is a terrible indictment. It is a spectator's picture.

In it is exemplified the peculiar advantage that the screen has over the stage in the fluidity of the material it uses in building the story. Our fates don't come to us out of the blue sky. On the stage, dialogue can subtly suggest the building up of fates; but the screen can show it. Then the play couldn't emphasize the beginnings of the love story of Jeff Ryder and Shirley Rossmore; couldn't show us their happiness together in the time before they knew that their sunshine wasn't to remain unclouded. The picture does, and doing so keeps us, by the convincing reality of it, from suspecting that it was "dragged in" to lend human "punch" to the Money Trust story.

We already know that John Burkett Ryder, the money king, has had Judge Rossmore impeached; but the lovers whom we see on the steamer coming across the Atlantic don't, and we alone know what's waiting for them. We had seen the upright judge, played with fine humanity by Bartley McCullum and indeed the best thing in the whole picture, signing the paper that will stir the ire of the money king. This man is played by George Soule Spenser with a touch now and then that suggests Napoleon. It is not wholly satisfying but will not be unpopular. True and human and full of pathos are those scenes in which the judge's wife, Eleanor Barry, whose weakness had left the way open for his trouble, now in tenderness tries to comfort him as he waits in a committee room of the capitol for the verdict and, later, cares for him in their little cottage. Admirably bright and satisfying are the love scenes on the ship, shown at this point, with Ethel Clayton as Shirley, the girl, and Gaston Bell as Jefferson Ryder, the young man. Hardly less pleasing is the homecoming of Shirley, her brave-hearted comforting of her parents and her break-down when they have gone up stairs and she is left alone with her father's old friend Judge Scott, played by Richard Morris.

Much care has been shown in all the scenes that go with the development of the story. The obsequious flunkies at Ryder's home and his solemnly impressive English secretary, by Walter C. Prichard, are valuable in the story and especially so is the care with which the great man is shown as guarded in his office from unimportant or bothersome visitors together with the itching eagerness of business men and schemers to get in to him. Then the social activities in the Scene from "The Lion and the Mouse" (Lubin).

Ryder house are peacefully pictured. Mrs. Ryder (Carlotta Doti), is a good rich man's wife, a sweet smiler upon her lord, quite careless that she is half neglected, who tries to make a comrade of her boy and is a good hostess. Cleverly brought out is the brisk fencing of Shirley and Ryder when the latter has read her book on the Money Trust and been impressed with the author's knowledge of what he thought was his own secrets. Short notes pass between them and the heroine wins a point every time until the financier has to have his wife invite her to come so that he can talk with her.

Quite satisfying to the mind is the scene at the meeting between the astonished Jefferson and his father's guest, "Miss Sarah Green," author of a book that has caused a stir; but the final struggle of the girl to get evidence that will rehabilitate her father, while winning fresh laurels at certain points and quite adequate in its exposition of the action, has not, in itself, quite the emphatic emphasis that, as we recall it, the play's dialogue gives the last scene. But there is not in the picture at any point the slightest feeling that the story has fallen down; it is good through all six reels. Among the lesser players, and all deserve notice, are Ruth Bryan, as Kate Roberts, and Lillie Leslie, the adventuress. The photography, except at one or two unimportant and short passages, is perfect.

FILM MAN EATEN BY LION?

A cable dispatch from Nairobi, British East Africa, dated January 27th, reads to the effect that one Fritz Schindler, member of an American moving picture expedition to that country, was attacked by a wild lion and torn to pieces. The only American expedition in that territory at the present time is that headed by J. C. Hemment, the well-known photographer. Inquiry at the New York photographic studio owned by Mr. Hemment brought forth the information that Schindler was unknown to them, and that he was not one of the party that left America with the expedition. In that case it is probable that the unfortunate man was one who was picked up when the party reached Nairobi and went along to help in the work.

CHICAGO LETTER

BY JAS. S. McQUADE.

"WHATEVER the women say about a motion picture goes," is the latest dictum of Major Funkhouser, head of the Chicago censor board. If the major had couched his opinion in the sentence "Whatever women, competent to judge, say about a motion picture goes," he would have been nearer the mark and to the wisdom line.

We are as gallant as the major in our actions and desire to accord good women sincere deference and praise in their work; but we are not willing to blind our eyes to the limitations of both good men and good women in certain capacities. A woman may be a good cook but a poor hostess; a charming hostess but a poor cook. She may be an angel of light and helpfulness in dark places, and yet a very martinet and disturber in her own household. She may possess—we are all willing to concede—excellent judgment on business, economical and sociological matters, yet be a very poor critic of art or the drama or the photodrama.

Nowadays it is already well established that a dramatic critic must not only be a newspaper man of tried ability, but also possessed of a special aptitude and knowledge for such work. The art critic is still more rigorously hedged in by requirements. Major Funkhouser issues the ultimatum that the photodrama can be competently judged by women, simply because they are women—good women.

Why is this?

Is it not because Major Funkhouser takes the view that he, as the appointed head of the Chicago censor board, has the right to determine for nearly three millions of people in Chicago what is moral and what is immoral in filmed subjects? He overlooks the fact that the authority of his position confines him to judging of the decency or indecency of scenes in films, just as in the spoken drama.

What court of law, or what authority, invests him with the right to decide as to what is moral or immoral for nearly three millions of people—or for one single individual, outside his own household? The same question applies to the good women whom he has selected to aid him in film censorship.

Who, after all, are the real censors of moving pictures and, generally, of morals? The people—the great majority of the population of the United States and elsewhere.

Our laws are what the people have made them; our morals likewise. The Funkhousers are lost in the infinite complexity of the vast social machinery at work.

Reputed men of God were instrumental in hanging innocent human beings at Salem, not long ago. Witches, they called these pitiable sacrifices to narrow mindedness! Funkhouserism, if it had its way, would lead to the same end, in the long run. It cannot and must not prevail.

Major Funkhouser is crying aloud for all good men and women of the city to come to his rescue and support him. In an address the other day, at the Hamilton Club, he said he had been told that moving picture men had $15,000,000 with which to put him out of business! Like all reformers of his kind, he rates himself too high; else he would never have paid any attention to such buncombe.

"They are ready to have me enjoined, saying they have the right to show films relative to the same subjects that the newspapers publish," he said. "They are organizing to go before the legislature to secure state censorship of films, which would mean no censorship at all. What are we going to do about it?"

Well, some pretty high legal authorities have already declared that films are publications. Damages were awarded a complainant in a court, recently, on that very ground. Judge Gaynor when mayor of New York declared in a speech that the authorities had no more right to censor the films we see, on moral grounds, than to censor the books that we read.

No one questions the sincerity and good intentions of Major Funkhouser in his extreme and narrow view of film censorship; but does that make him right? The Salem witches were hanged just because of similar sincerity and similar good intentions on the part of their persecutors.

The near future will show that the manufacturer who produces films inimical to the progress of the people at large will be censored in a way that will bring him quickly to his knees. His product will be boycotted until he mends his ways.

The manufacturer of films who overlooks his responsibility for his output is a grave menace to the cinematographic industry.

Private Presentation of "Buffalo Bill" Pictures.

On Wednesday, January 21, United States army officers stationed in Chicago were given a private view of the moving pictures taken last October at Pine Ridge, S. D., when several thousand soldiers of the regular army and a large body of Indians took part in reproductions of the Indian wars of 1876 and the war of the Messiahs in 1890 and 1891. Others present were: "Buffalo Bill" (Col. William F. Cody), Gen. Nelson A. Miles, Gen. Charles King, and others who participated in the conflicts with the Indians before the camera.

The exhibition was given in the private exhibition room of the Essanay Co., First National Bank Building, and occupied two hours. It was impossible to show the entire film in the time at disposal.

Among those invited, in addition to those already mentioned, were: Gen. Baldwin, Gen. Wheaton, Gen. Stuart, Col. Schunk, Col. Baker, Col. Kingsbury, Col. McCarthy, Col. Kimball, Col. McDonald, Maj. Ray and Capt. Billinsleg.

One of the pictures that deeply impressed the army officers was a reproduction of the battle of the Badlands. The battle of Wounded Knee also aroused the interest of the party. Pictures in which the government officials are said to be specially interested are those showing the Indian schools, where the Indian boys and girls, whose fathers participated in the many wars, are now busily engaged in study. The battle of War Bonnet Creek was vivid, Col. Cody and Gen. King both being participants.

The pictures will be taken to Washington, in the near future, where they will be given a private presentation before President Wilson, members of his cabinet, and others.

Moving Pictures to Educate Prospective Voters.

Moving pictures are to be used in the campaign for educating prospective voters for the coming elections in Chicago. The movement has been started by the woman's citizenship committees in many of the wards, whose leaders declare that these efforts, made primarily in behalf of the woman voters, will be of immense educational value to both men and women about to vote.

Films will be prepared showing women standing at the registering desk, and at a later day entering the polling booths. Accompanying each film will be the exhortation thrown on the screen "Register on February 3!" Through moving pictures it is thought that fully three-quarters of the population will be instructed in the method of registering and using the ballot.

Film Censor for Evanston.

Commissioner of Public Safety, Walter C. Hedrick, and Mayor James Russell Smart, of Evanston, have decided to appoint an officer to censor moving pictures shown in the north shore suburb. Who the censor will be has not yet been announced. Mayor Smart favors Miss Mary Carney, the policewoman sworn in recently for that Chicago suburb. The officer will see every film before it is exhibited publicly.

"The pictures of wild west 'blood and thunder' life will not be allowed," the mayor has said. "What we want here is something instructive in the films."

Russian Attempt to Suppress Pictures of Kiev Trial in London.

A recent cable from London to the Chicago Examiner exposes the recent attempt made by the Russian government to prevent the presentation of the film in the metropolis.

It appears that the film was advertised to be shown at the Oxford Music Hall, Sunday evening, January 18, and that the London county council telephoned the management to postpone the presentation. On Monday, however, the management decided to assume all risk involved by disobeying the command.

It appears that just as the London county council was about to issue the necessary permission for the showing of the pictures, a note was received from the Imperial Russian consulate to restrain the presentation. This was done, but the chairman of the council rescinded the action of Sunday, saying that he would not take the responsibility for further prohibition of the exhibition of the pictures.

When the Russian consul general was notified of this decision, he was startled.

"They will never dare to show that film; they must not," he said. "I have written to the London county council explaining that the pictures are a grave slander on the Russian police and the Russian people. They have promised to put a ban on the pictures."

When he was assured that the pictures were being shown at that very moment, he replied: "After those pictures appear, I shall not be surprised if there resulted a grave straining of the cordial relations existing between the Russian and English governments."

Chicago Film Brevities.

Carl Laemmle, president of the Universal, accompanied by Joe Brandt, arrived in the city from New York Tuesday, January 20th. Mr. Laemmle left for St. Louis on Wednesday, where he will remain attending to business there until it is time to take the train direct to Cincinnati, to attend the opening of the Ohio state convention. Mr. Brandt visited Milwaukee and other points while here. He will also be present at the Ohio state convention.

D. W. Russell, representing David Horsley, American agent for the Lumiere film product, in his Chicago office, 30 N. Dearborn St., paid a call at the World office last week and reported very satisfactory business. It is expected that the office will be moved to a suite in the Schiller building, in the near future.

J. H. Brown, manager of the Lynn Theater, 1042 W. 63rd Street, this city, called at the World office last week and reported that the Lynn had been thoroughly remodeled and completed about a month ago. The Lynn seats about 300 people and offers Universal programs at an admission of five cents. Mr. Brown is much pleased with present business. He renewed his subscription for the World.

Our old friend, George Hines, is able to be up and around again. He writes from South Bend, Ind., that his programs at the Auditorium Theater are giving great satisfaction. He is using the General Film Company's Special Service and the Famous Players product, five reels daily, with daily changes, charging 10 cents admission to the main floor and five cents to the balcony. The very best people in South Bend are patronizing the Auditorium, George says. Every night a long line of autos bringing fashionable theater parties is lined up on both sides of the street, outside the theater. Great praise is due Mrs. Lyda Hines for her ability and enterprise in conducting the theater during the incapacitation of Mr. Hines.

The recently formed Anti-Defamation League and other Jewish societies, organized to prevent caricaturing of the Jewish race, exercised their powers of censorship one day last week when Major Funkhouser agreed to suppress a picture reel entitled, "Rebecca's Wedding." A committee of Jewish women who viewed the film declared that its purpose was to create laughter by making women of that race appear ridiculous.

Frank McMillan, general manager of the E. E. Fulton Company, 154 W. Lake Street, this city, was seen one day last week. Much of the success of the Lake Street company is due to Mr. McMillan's extensive acquaintance with the trade and to fine managerial ability. Mr. McMillan is one of the oldest men at present in the trade in the machine and supply business. His experience dates away back from about the middle 90's. He reported business very brisk for this time of the year.

Miss Ruth Stonehouse, the leading lady of one of Essanay's Eastern companies, was united in marriage to Joseph Roach, in St. Louis, Monday, January 19. Miss Stonehouse is a charming little lady and a clever photoplayer. Her marriage will not interrupt her career before the camera, it is said. Mr. Roach is a well known scenario writer. The Moving Picture World wishes them a long and happy married life.

Dwight Elmendorf has been enjoying great success for several weeks past at Orchestra Hall, this city, with picture programs in black and white and in colors. The pictures cover the Eastern hemisphere, including India, Java, Ceylon, etc., and also various countries in Europe. The Balkan states, which are just now holding the minds of the people with considerable interest, are also well represented in the pictures. Mr. Elmendorf's able lectures are quite as interesting as the pictures themselves, and are gaining for him extensive and favorable criticism in the daily press.

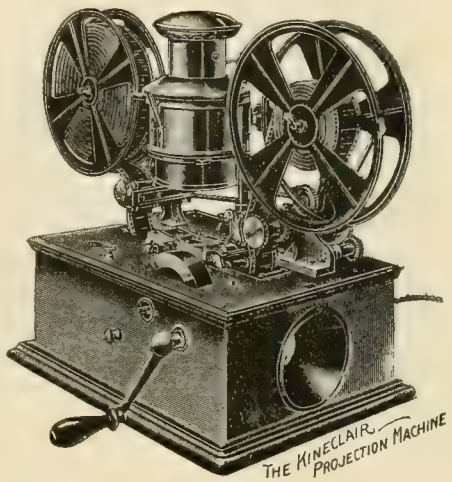
Mrs. Harriett Ohming, part owner of the Starland Theater, Michigan City, Ind., which was opened last November, paid a pleasant call at the World office last week. The Starland seats 650 people, and offers four reels special service of the General Film Company for ten and five cents. Mrs. Ohming stated that she will show "The Adventures of Kathlyn" during the week of January 26th. "Absinthe" was shown the night of January 23rd. The Starland has installed a fine $5,000 pipe organ and the very latest ventilating system. The indirect lighting system is used and two Power's No. 6-A machines are installed in the operating room. The view of the interior is enhanced by an electric fountain set on one side of the stage. Mrs. Ohming had many good words for the World and renewed her subscription.

A New Projector

Reviewed by F. H. Richardson.

The Eclair Film Company, New York City, is preparing to place on the American market a new projector. This machine is not designed for use in regular theatrical work. It was constructed primarily with the idea of supplying a compact, medium priced, practical projection machine for use in churches, schools and by lecturers, traveling salesmen, etc. Its design is unique, and, so far as the actual projection mechanism is concerned, it is nothing more or less than the standard projector laid down flat on its face plate. As may be seen by the illustration, the gate and aperture of the machine lie horizontally. The film passes from the reel down over a sprocket through the gate and up over another sprocket on to the take-up reel. There is a loop just under each one of the sprockets. The top of the balance wheel is seen protruding through the surface of the box. Underneath the gate is a mirror which reflects the picture into the objective lens, whence it passes to the screen. The arrangement in the center which looks like a metropolitan fire engine is the lamp, the same being a Nernst Glower, but it is intended to supplant this soon with a baby arc lamp. Just back of the crank is seen the end of the fly wheel shaft. The crank may be attached there, and the film then becomes a series of stereopticon pictures, since there is only one exposure to each revolution of the crank. The machine is self-contained and can be prepared for carrying and shipment in less than two minutes. There is a sheet metal top which sets over the whole mechanism, and the projector then has somewhat the appearance of a Gladstone bag, although, of course, it is all metal.



The projector is thoroughly practical, very simple and as substantial as a regular standard projector. A two blade shutter is used and the result on the screen is excellent, the picture being steady and without perceptible flicker. I understand that the whole thing weighs just seventeen pounds.

Current is taken from an ordinary lamp socket, the consumption being from 2 to 4 amperes. The film may be stopped and left standing with the light rays on it indefinitely.

There is a rapidly growing field for this type of machine—that is to say, a reliable, well made, practical projector which can be readily carried from place to place and perform its work with current taken from an ordinary lamp socket. I can see no reason why the Eclair Company should not secure at least a goodly portion of this business if they go after it.

WATCH PRESENTED TO TOM INCE.

A rather belated news item comes from California to the effect that while Mr. Ince stood by and watched the distribution of his gifts to the several hundreds of employees, he was surprised from behind by a troupe of his own cowboys, lassoed and bound, taken to a position on a platform and there presented by George Osborne with a platinum watch chain, set solid with huge diamonds, the gift of the members of the New York motion picture companies whom he himself had planned to surprise. But what worries us is why it should take five weeks for a Christmas item to travel from Los Angeles to New York.

"Evangeline"

The Canadian Bioscope Company's Five-Part Adaptation of Longfellow's Famous Poem Is a Good Picture.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

IN its first release the Canadian Bioscope Company has chosen to put on the screen a real Canadian subject. At the same time it is a subject of which the wide world has knowledge and in which it is interested; for there are few languages into which "Evangeline" has not been translated. Good judgment has been displayed in the making of this five-part subject—good picture judgment. It was staged by E. P. Sullivan and W. H. Cavanaugh, both old-time screen players. The production is divided into two epochs. The first carries the story to the breaking up of the homes of the farmers and their assembling on the ocean shore for deportation, and to the portrayal of this division of the poem four reels are devoted. The fifth part shows the wanderings of Evangeline and Gabriel in the forests and the scenes, years later, in the hospital where the two lovers meet. It is important to state that the picture was made in the Annapolis Valley, in authentic locations.

"Evangeline" opens with a panoramic view of "the forest primeval." Then follow harvesting scenes, the cutting of cornstalks and work that goes with preparations for winter. We see the shepherd "back with his bleating flock from the seaside." Around the great barns the turkeys, the hens, and the chickens are being fed, the big herd of cows milked. There is a thrill when Evangeline enters the picture. She is light-hearted, blithe—always wholesome, intensely human. She satisfies the eye and the conception of what this great character should be. We are introduced to sturdy Basil the blacksmith hammering at his forge and witness his wrath when his son Gabriel tells him of the proclamation posted by the soldiers.

There is an impressive ceremony by the seashore when Father Felician gives thanks for the preservation from flood, due to the successful repairing of the dikes. By the way, the priest is much in evidence throughout the picture. He is the true father of his flock, the friend and counselor. At the feast of the betrothal there are merry scenes. The dancing is interrupted by the ominous pealing of the bell, summoning the men to the church, where they are by the soldiers placed under arrest. The women are not permitted to enter; they wait in the churchyard. We see the riot in the church and its sudden quelling by the upraised hand of Father Felician. Then follow the packing of household goods on the ox teams, the journeys to the shore, the pathetic leave-takings. As the men and women and children gathered on the beach discover the smoke from the burning homes Benedict Bellefontaine, the father of Evangeline, is stricken with death.

The scene changes to the heartbreaking search of Evangeline for Gabriel. There is shown the historic episode of the passing in the night of the son of the blacksmith as his sweetheart sleeps in the boat drawn up on the shore, following her discovery of Basil's home, where she learned that Gabriel had gone into the woods. The final scenes are of the hospital. Evangeline, in the black robe of a nun, goes from cot to cot ministering to the sick. Her discovery of the gray-bearded and dying Gabriel is just what we feel it should be—intensely dramatic, appealing, moving.

The story of Longfellow is closely followed. The picture is well acted. Laura Lyman is Evangeline. John F. Carleton is Gabriel, Mr. Sullivan is Father Felician, Arthur Morrison is Basil, Michael Hannafy is Benedict, and Mr. Cavanaugh is Rene LeBlanc, the notary. Aside from its value to the general exhibitor the production will have marked interest for entertainments in churches and schools. It is a good picture.

Frank B. Hubin

With the Aid of Motion Pictures He Put Pleasantville on the Map.

YOU will add considerably to your fund of knowledge by becoming acquainted with Frank B. Hubin, the Earl of Pleasantville, in the county of Atlantic and the state of New Jersey. Pleasantville, until Hubin alighted in its main street, belonged to the submerged portion of Southern New Jersey. People did not exactly live in Pleasantville but simply waited for the date of their funeral. The sight of a stranger in the purlieus of Pleasantville caused feverish commotion. Now and then an automobilist, naturally anxious to pass through Pleasantville as rapidly as possible, would be stopped by a constable and made to contribute his mite to the prosperity of the village. Outside of these occasional brief spells of life the village dozed much as it had dozed in the days of George III. Then came Hubin catapulting himself into this living morgue. "Big Frank" arrived with the tin-tinnabulations of a circus. He shouted "wake up" by day, and kept an electric sign to that effect burning by night. "Open a motion picture house in this decrepit burg," he cried on the most prominent corner where the oldest inhabitants used to swap lies. "Get on the map!" No response forthcoming "Big Frank" built a fine picture house right near the post office and almost opposite the one and only drugstore. Then there were signs of life. The whole village seemed to rouse from the torpor of the last two hundred years. Let the Earl of Pleasantville tell the story in his own words: "The post office has jumped from a third class to a second class and free delivery is in sight. The main streets are now paved, there is a building boom, they have erected a new fire house, factories are going up and the more progressive men are talking even of numbering the houses. The ancient sleepy town has applied for a city charter. All this shows you what a good picture show will do for a dead town if the right live wire comes along."

GEORGE ALBERT SMITH WINS.

Urban's Partner Declared by English High Court of Justice to be True Inventor of Kinemacolor.

JUSTICE WARRINGTON, sitting in the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, has within the last week handed down a final decision in the case of a petition for revoking a patent (No. 26,671) granted to George Albert Smith for "improvements in and relating to kinematograph apparatus for the production of colored pictures." The decision is adverse and dismisses the petition. In legal language no ground had been shown for the revocation of the patent and the petition must, therefore, be dismissed with costs. The court also granted the prayer of the respondents for a certificate that the validity of the patent has come into question.

In its decision the court takes up, one after another, all the points alleged by the petitioner and rules on every one of them adversely to the claims of the petitioner and favorably to the claims of the original patentee, George Albert Smith, a partner of Charles Urban and one of the inventors of Kinemacolor. The court recognizes that prior George Albert Smith.

* * * To the date of the patent in question, attempts had been made, notably by Lee and Turner in 1899, to reproduce moving scenes in color by a combination of the method of reproducing colors by super-imposition, to which I have already referred, with that of reproducing a moving scene by means of persistence of vision. These attempts, however, failed in practice, because inasmuch as it became necessary to produce three separate images in the very short time during which the persistence of vision continued, the films would not stand the strain of the extremely rapid rate at which the machinery had to be run. Suggestions had also been made for taking two negatives instead of three, using screens of two colors only, but in my opinion it is not shown that any of these suggestions had had any practical result.

The court goes on to say that the objection of the petitioners as to the alleged insufficiency of the specification in the original patent is not sustained by the facts. He goes into this phase of the question very thoroughly, taking up almost word for word the language of the original specification and showing that in spite of its occasional obscurity it makes its meaning fairly clear.

Passing to the other objection made against the patent, i. e., the want of novelty, the court says:

On the suggestion of want of novelty, so far as it is founded on published documents, I cannot find that the invention, the point and substance of which I have already stated, is disclosed in any of them. I find also that the invention was such an advance on what was previously known on the subject that, as regards subject-matter, there can be no valid objection to the patent. But the Petitioners contend that the invention was published before the date of the patent by an alleged prior user, and the publication thereof. Their case in this respect depends upon the evidence of Mr. Friese Greene and several persons to whom he is said to have disclosed the invention. Now, this is a matter of which the facts are entirely in the knowledge of the Petitioners and their witnesses, and the Respondents cannot in the nature of things directly contradict their statements. The evidence, therefore, ought to be very carefully scrutinized before coming to the conclusion that the Petitioners have established their case. Mr. Friese Greene is a person who, at the date of the alleged publication, was conducting, and had previously conducted, a great number of experiments with the object of arriving at a satisfactory method of producing moving pictures in color, and he had indeed taken out several patents for inventions on the subject which he believed himself to have made. In the course of such experiments he did succeed in producing certain films, and in projecting images of those films by means substantially those adopted by the patentee, but except as an experiment he made no use himself of such discovery, and, I think, I may take it that he attached little importance to it inasmuch as though he took out numerous patents he did not take out one for this, and in fact to the present day he considers that his real invention on the subject is what has been called the prism process described in his Specification of 1905. He exhibited images produced in the way I have mentioned to several persons, none of whom were under any obligation of secrecy, express or implied, except perhaps his wife and son; but to none of these persons did he, in my opinion, disclose his invention. To all of them, with the exception of Mr. Richardson, with whose case I will deal presently, he exhibited the image only, that is to say, the result of the invention and not the invention itself. To none of them did he explain the method by which the result was obtained. To Mr. Richardson he did give some explanation but the Petitioners have failed to satisfy me that such explanation dealt with anything but the method described in his own Specification of 1898, and the Specification of his prism patent of 1905. On the whole I find that the Petitioners have failed to establish a prior public use of the invention, and this objection therefore fails.

The court, speaking of the patentee whose rights were questioned under the petition, says:

Mr. Smith is a man who, for many years, has devoted himself to the production of moving pictures as his main object in life. He is of considerable distinction in the science of the subject and at the time in question had conducted many experiments and was well versed in the technical part of the subject. Dr. Grune, on the other hand, is a medical man who has taken up color photography and the production of moving pictures more as a pastime than as his pursuit in life. He has, it is true, invented lenses for color photography having the peculiarity of containing in themselves the filters in the form of colored liquids. It is not proved, however, that these lenses ever obtained any substantial success with the public at large. In considering the weight to be given to Dr. Grune's evidence, moreover, I cannot forget that the point as to the shutter was not mentioned in the Particulars, the materials for which were of course supplied by Dr. Grune; and if he had then mentioned the point it is hardly conceivable that it would have been omitted. These two gentlemen, being both interested in the same subject and living near each other, met pretty often and to some extent interchanged ideas. The alleged disclosure of the idea of using two colors only for still life photographs is, in my opinion, unimportant. The really important disclosure, if made, was that of the revolving shutter in its application to moving pictures taken and shown with two colors only. On this point Mrs. Grune's evidence is no corroboration and that of Dr. Grune stands by itself.

Now, it is part of the Petitioners' own case that Mr. Smith had been making numerous experiments for two years at least before the date of the patent, and, having regard to his position and experience, I cannot bring myself to believe that the use of the shutter was communicated by Dr. Grune to him. I think his story is much more likely to be correct, namely, that he mentioned it to Dr. Grune, who was sceptical as to its effect until he saw Mr. Smith's demonstration with the temporary cardboard shutter. I think also that if Dr. Grune was, as he now says, the true and first inventor, he would have made a serious claim to obtain the credit and profit of an invention which has no doubt, with subsequent improvements, proved of great importance and value in the production and exhibition of moving pictures.

This decision ends this litigation forever and finally fixes the rights of George Albert Smith as the true inventor of what to-day is known as Kinemacolor.

MOORE BUILDING NEW HOME.

H. T. Moore, 307 Eleventh Street, Olympia, Washington, will open in that city on or about March 1st a first-class moving picture theater. It will have a seating capacity of 700. Mr. Moore has had seven years' experience in the picture business.

The Cameraman.

By F. H. Richardson.

THERE is one craftsman, or shall we say artist, whose connection with the moving picture industry is a most vital one in that, utterly regardless of what others may do, no matter how splendid may be the projection, no matter how beautiful the theater, or how carefully worked out may be the details of the plot, or how magnificent the acting, still, if this particular individual fails in his part the whole thing is, at best, but mediocre. I refer, of course, to the cameraman—the real man behind the gun.

It cannot be said that success or failure, as a whole, depends upon any one particular thing, or any one particular craft, yet there are certain things which may be classed as important and certain other things which may be classed as imperative when we speak of success. The work of the cameraman must be perfect if the final work is to be perfect; the acting must be at least passable if the production is to prove a success, and the projection must be perfect if the work of the actors and the work of the cameraman is to receive justice. The beauty of the theater itself, excellence of ventilation, the finer points of its management are things of importance, but they do not come in the imperative class in the making of a perfect photoplay. The acting, the work of the cameraman, the proper developing and printing, and operating are the imperative things.

But to get back to our subject: the craft of the cameraman is, as near as any other one thing, the foundation stone of the structure. The cameraman must be an adept and an expert in the matter of light, exposure, lenses and several other things, if he is to be depended upon to make a perfect exposure under any and all possible conditions; that is to say, conditions where it is possible to do perfect work. He may today be working in a well equipped studio, with a light of known value at a certain given distance which will enable him to figure out with mathematical certainty the precise result which a certain lens aperture will produce. Tomorrow he may be called upon to take a picture in the open with bright sunlight and, between two scenes perhaps, the sky becomes overcast and the light value changes entirely, yet, if he be a man who thoroughly understands his business, he will be able to make an exposure under each of these conditions, and of hundreds of others which might arise, which will give practically a uniform result when it is finally finished and projected to the screen.

Now, we who have "monkeyed" with the Kodak in our little amateurish way know something of the difficulties of getting a perfect negative even with that little instrument. How often we have confidently "shot" something which we particularly wanted, only to discover, when the developing was finished, that we had over-exposed, or under-exposed, or did something else which we should not have done, and that the picture was either totally ruined or of very little value. This little experience gives us some faint idea of the difficulty of the cameraman's work and the accurate knowledge which he must possess.

Then think of the responsibility which rests upon his shoulders. Perhaps a scene has been gotten together at enormous expense; maybe the company has traveled hundreds of miles to make it in some special locality, or perhaps it is a studio scene in which hundreds of people are involved. All that money is wasted if the cameraman misjudges his light, or does anything else which will spoil the negative. Of course, it must be conceded that in the developing some of the faults of the cameraman can be partially remedied, but, while I don't pretend to be an expert, still I am firmly convinced that while the after handling of the film, i. e., the developing, etc., may utterly ruin or at least very greatly injure the best efforts of the cameraman, it cannot, on the other hand, wholly eliminate any fault due to his errors.

And yet I am informed that there are producers who emulate the theater manager who asks the operator applicant how much he will work for before he asks how much he knows about his business. I am reliably informed that there are producers who use green cameramen and "take a chance" rather than pay an expert and thoroughly reliable man a good salary. Viewing the matter in the light of common sense, it does seem to me that a policy of this sort is little short of idiotic.

There are in this country, I am informed, considerably less than two hundred skilled cameramen, although there are a small flock of would-be's, and these would-be's are responsible, at least in a measure, for a considerable percentage of the bad pictures shown on the screens of our theaters.

When recently I had the pleasure of meeting with the New York Cinema Camera Men's Club, I there found a body of alert, bright, intelligent gentlemen who, by their arguments and conversation, proved themselves to be high class men; men of ideas and brains. Of course, as in any body of men, some tower head and shoulders above others, but all those I had the pleasure of meeting impressed me favorably, and it struck me as being a matter of common justice that their side of the story ought to be told, and although I don't feel myself capable or competent of telling it in the best possible manner, still I have done the best I know.

The New York Cinema Camera Men's Club will give a ball in the near future, which I trust will be well attended, and perhaps we shall then become better acquainted with the real man-behind-the-gun.

J. A. Eslow.

The accompanying photograph is a likeness of J. A. Eslow, general manager of the New England Universal Film Exchange, Boston, and with branch offices in Springfield and Bangor. Before starting in the moving picture business, Mr. Eslow was engaged in municipal and government contracting, but in 1903, Mr. Eslow made his official bow to the moving picture industry by opening the Bijou Theater in his home town of Albion, Mich. As a tribute to Mr. Eslow's good judgment, it might be remarked that this house is still running, never having been closed since its inception.

J. A. Eslow.

Since entering the exchange end of the business, Mr. Eslow has opened and managed exchanges in Louisville, Ky., Des Moines, Iowa, and in Chicago. When the Mutual Film Corporation was first organized Mr. Eslow was selected to manage the New England offices at Boston. By his policy of a "square deal" Mr. Eslow has met with undoubted success in this territory, and, at the time of his resignation, he handed over to his successors one of the largest exchanges the Mutual was operating in this country. Last August found Mr. Eslow in complete charge of the three offices of the New England Universal Film Exchange.

Mr. Eslow is active, alert, progressive, and is continually adopting new ideas, all tending to benefit the Universal exhibitor. One of his latest innovations is an automobile delivery car to facilitate the handling of films. Exhibitors qualified to speak on the matter assert Mr. Eslow to be one of the broadest-gauged men in the exchange business in this section. The result of innate ability, backed up by long experience and knowledge, usually is success; and this is exactly what it spells in Mr. Eslow's case. The New England Universal Film Exchange is doing a good, profitable business, which may be attributed to Mr. Eslow and his staff.

MAJESTIC OPENED IN COLUMBUS, OHIO.

A first-class moving picture theater has been opened by Max Stern on Capitol Square, Columbus, Ohio. It has been named The Majestic, and has a seating capacity of 1,200. It is well appointed and up to date in every respect. Among its many features is a $10,000 pipe organ, which is presided over by Thomas Collis. This instrument is played only with the presentation of films calling for such accompaniment, while an orchestra plays to pictures which do not require organ music. J. A. Maddox, who has recently been prominently identified with the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, is the manager of the Majestic. With the destiny of the theater in the hands of such men as Stern and Maddox, the future of the house seems assured.

GRIMES BROS. LEASES BUILDING.

Grimes Bros., proprietors of the Arc Theater, Crawfordsville, Ind., have taken a long-time lease on a building owned by the Supreme Tribe Ben-Hur, and will remodel it into a first-class picture theater. The new house will have two alley exits and two rear exits. The floor and operating-room will be of concrete. Two Power's No. 6-A machines will be installed. It will seat about 380. Wednesdays and Saturdays will be feature days.

Moving Picture Educator

MOVING PICTURE shows for school children are to be given in New York under the supervision of the Educational Alliance. The price of admission will be three cents. This announcement is made on the authority of City Superintendent of Schools William H. Maxwell, who has been looking into the advisability of the scheme.

District Superintendents Henry E. Jenkins and C. A. Kidd have been studying the entertainments given at the Alliance Building, and it was decided on their report to introduce the pictures in the school buildings. These superintendents say that there will be no piratical romances or stories of stolen gold or anything similar which might unduly inflame the young mind. All agree that the accomplishment of great good is anticipated.

At the annual meeting of the New York Kindergarten Association, held this week, Miss Susan E. Blow advocated the use of moving pictures in the primary grades. To the kindergarten, she said, was due the fact that there was much more color and life in primary grade teaching than there used to be. In future, however, the use of the moving picture is going to be centered in the telling of stories and the acting of little plays which would replace the old primer. The steady growth of the moving picture in every phase of school life is daily more noticeable. Growing into use and outgrowing difficulties is characteristic of the moving picture, and, while its advocates, in their enthusiasm, have seemed impatient, such impatience was born of the keen assurance of those facts which are now being borne in upon every company of leaders in pedagogical work.

The Kineclair.

Mention ought to be made on this page of the "Kineclair," which is a moving picture projecting machine made by the Eclair Company for the purpose of showing pictures in small places, such as schoolrooms and private houses.

The writer was able to see one at work in the Eclair studios recently, and was much impressed both by the immediate results and by the greater possibilities when further improvements are completed. The first advantage claimed for the Kineclair is that standard films may be used; secondly, that the progress of the picture may be arrested at any point for the purpose of explanation or lecturer's emphasis. The ordinary electric current of the household electric light is strong enough, making an attachment possible anywhere. At the outset, the machine is very attractive; should it prove equal to all that is claimed for it, there is no doubt that great advance has been made in the matter of securing moving pictures under the easiest possible circumstances.

The Pathe Company has a number of good educational subjects in its January releases, which, judging by their titles, are valuable additions to their respective classes; they are:

Scenic, or Travel: "Snow Effects in Austria," "A Ramble in Pondicherry, India," "The Seventeen-Mile Drive, California," "The Oasis of Gabes, Tunis," "Seringapatam, Southern India."

Studies in Zoology: "Insects that Mimic," "Submarine Mysteries," "At Homa with the Heron."

The Edison Company has "An Ostrich Farm in South Africa," which will give a contrast to a similar subject taken in California.

Reading the Mind by Kinematography.

This is no fancy idea of the undisputed powers of the kinematograph, nor is it an exaggeration of the application of those powers, but a clear suggestion of one of the greatest possible uses to which those powers may yet be applied.

The principal of an English educational institution has expressed the conviction that the kinematograph will not only be used but rather become absolutely indispensable for purposes which at present have not occurred to the average enthusiast in educational kinematography. His contention is that by means of kinematography "we can obtain, not only a living record of what an animated mind perceives, but also an infallible register of the working of the mind itself." Of course, this is purely a psychological matter and the theory upon which these assumptions are based belongs to the realm of experimental psychology. Psychologists have long been acquainted with the close relationship between an individual's physical sensations and mental capacity. Many specialists in mind diseases carry out their diagnoses along these lines.

Feelings and emotions from whatsoever causes will by means of "devices" be caught or registered and repeated on the screen for development and reference. Those "devices" are already in use, Mr. Carvallo of the Mercy Institute in Paris utilized them in connection with his investigations in ultra-rapid and radio-kinematography. If, after due and elaborate testings, the claims in this direction prove true and satisfactory, the results will prove to be of a value beyond the most sanguinary anticipations of those who expected great things from the secret powers of the fundamental principles of the moving picture.

Mental Standardization.

In the schools the first great benefit of the application of this examination would be the mental standardizing of the scholar. This does not necessarily mean the deficient one, but also the average one. In one of the Newark (N. J.) schools recently a teacher noticed a boy to whom mathematics was evidently distasteful; by way of experiment she tried music; to her astonishment the boy seemed immediately at home, and further trials proved that a musical prodigy had been discovered. Mental standardization would in every instance develop and expose the inherent possibilities and capabilities of each boy and girl. In the class-room it will assist the teacher to adapt pedagogical methods to the idiosyncrasies of the child, saving both teacher and scholar much labor and torture.

Vocational Helpfulness.

The choice of a career is one of the most treacherous questions in the early history of youth. Through life many a career has been thwarted by lack of proper direction. Criminologists tell us that if some method whereby "vocational direction" can be obtained the future of many youths could be safely directed, the lack of it being responsible for many of the youthful evils of the present day. The choice of a career will be greatly facilitated by a knowledge of the child's temperament and proclivities. It will also solve many problems facing educators at the present time owing to the variations of the living material to be dealt with. While the question is purely kine-scientific, psychological, and scholastic, it is the greatest one which has yet presented itself to the powers of the moving picture as an educator, as, it before educating, the kinematograph can mentally standardize and vocationally direct the scholar, principle of proper education will easily and readily follow.

MAKING STEEL FENCES.

The five reel commercial subject entitled "Through the Mill to the Farmer," which the commercial department of the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company produced for the American Steel & Wire Company, is scoring a big hit.

The showing of these films to farmer's institutes and at hardware conventions has been very effective and the second and third sets will be sent out immediately. The scenes show modern methods of ore mining, and shipping; the manufacture of pig iron; the open hearth and Bessemer process of steel making, through every process to the final scenes showing the proper way of building a wire fence.

The Essanay cameraman visited four steel mills in various parts of the country and the mines of the Oliver Iron Mining Company, located near Duluth, Minn. J. W. Meaker, Jr., manager of the fence department is very well pleased with the work.

UNUSUAL MOTIOGRAPH INSTALLATION.

The Iowa Institution for Feeble Minded Children of Glenwood, Iowa, has installed a late model Motiograph equipment. O. F. Spahr, general manager, Enterprise Optical Mfg. Co., is greatly pleased over the January sales, and judging from the present orders, he expects a big increase in sales for 1914 over last year.

Foreign Trade Notes

BRITISH NOTES.

(Special Correspondence to THE WORLD.)

Notwithstanding its comparatively late start, the film producing industry in this country is making headway extraordinarily, and not the least surprising adjunct in its march of progress is the development and growth of the scenario-writer. The scenario-editor of a South Coast studio tells me that one-third of their plots come from the general public, one-third from film-plot agencies, of which there is a good round dozen in London alone, and the remaining third from their own staff of writers. From this statement it is fairly evident that no firm can depend entirely upon its own corps of writers for its scenarios, for even quite an army of writers would at the present rate of film production rapidly exhaust most of their ideas. Therefore the dependence upon the general public for plots and ideas is becoming more marked, and it may be taken that a considerable quantity of this material only reaches the producers by way of an agency. One of these agencies has recently banded its contributors together into what may be described as a miniature scenario trust. The object of the promoters is apparently to create a monopoly of scenarios and to bind its contributors to send their manuscripts to no other office by a worthless guarantee of production.

By the time this communication reaches America, Charles Urban, of Kinemacolor fame, will also have arrived in New York. He goes to America in connection with the affairs of the American Kinemacolor Company and the probability is that he will remain for a month or six weeks.

Again during the Christmas and New Year holidays, Kalem's production, "From Manger to Cross," was as much in evidence as any Biblical subject. In several instances the picture was exhibited under the auspices of religious institutions and the high testimony accorded by the clergy was practically a repetition of its extraordinary reception a year ago. At an Oxford Street hall the King's trumpeter is engaged to accompany this film.

* * *

The moving picture has been turned to the rescue of the moving picture in a novel manner. A film entitled "Closed on Sunday" is being produced with a view to illustrating in a striking and effective way the useful moral purposes served by allowing picture shows to open on the Sabbath in competition with drinking saloons. The plot is strong and interesting and will accomplish, no doubt, good propaganda work among stubborn officials and irritant clerics who regard Sunday exhibitions as detrimental to the integrity and upbringing of the rising generation. Meanwhile the Middlesex County Council are as firm as ever in their decision not to permit Sunday opening, and the position has become so acute that there is a great probability of litigation. Police evidence has been produced to show the decrease of drunkenness where Sunday shows are held, but without avail, and the opinion of those qualified to speak on the subject is that the only satisfactory settlement of this two-year-old difficulty can be arrived at in the law courts.

Profiting, I fancy, by the experience and success of the Vitagraph Company and the Flying A Company in filming stories adapted from popular fiction on the actual scenes in the book, the Captain Kettle Film Company has sent out to West Africa a stock company of players, cameramen, and impedimenta, there to enact some of the hair-raising scenes that made Mr. Platt's stories world famous.

From time to time, and especially with the development of the exclusive film, exhibitors have complained against the practice of certain film manufacturers in first offering attractive subjects to music halls in preference to moving picture theaters. This matter provoked a discussion at this week's meeting of the Committee of the Cinematograph Exhibitors' Association of Great Britain and Ireland, Ltd., and eventually the following resolution was passed: "Having in view the detrimental effect upon the cinema hall proprietor by reason of certain renters and manufacturers renting out films to music hall proprietors throughout the country before giving the genuine exhibitor an opportunity to tender for the same film, the Executive Counsel of the Exhibitors' Association earnestly appeals to those interested to refrain from a continuance of this practice." Two American firms, it has been stated "sub rosa," are particular offenders and only recently considerable agitation was caused in a northern city through the announcement that the A. B. feature "The Battle of Elderbush Gulch," would be exhibited "exclusively" at a local "legitimate" theater.

H. G. Wells, the scientific novelist, has at last consented to have reproduced in film form some of his most notable creations. The Gaumont Co., I have heard, have secured world rights of reproduction, but the first releases are not due yet for some months.

I have mentioned Kalem's "From Manger to Cross" being featured at Christmas at the Oxford St. picture house, London. In order to secure public opinion of the picture the management adopted the novel expedient of placing in the lobby a criticism book in which visitors were invited to give an expression of opinion as to the merits or demerits of the program of the above film. Israel Zangwill, the author, wrote "An artistic triumph; the kinema put to its true use." To exhibitors at a loss what class of film to provide for their patrons the criticism book idea might commend itself.

H. R. Smith, who recently resigned his post as manager of the English agency of the Edison Co. (film dept.), has been appointed manager of the Anderson Film Agency of London. Mr. Smith will be succeeded by T. P. Rothwell.

Jas. McEnnery, of New York, is spending a week or two on this side and has purchased the entire American rights from the Anchor Film Co. of two exclusive features entitled, "£1,000 Reward" and "Nobody's Child." Mr. McEnnery, who will be remembered in the United States through his handling of Chas. Hawtrey's picture "A Message from Mars," returns to New York in February.

W. H. Bell, of Chicago, who also arrived here a few days ago, is making his headquarters during his stay at the Essanay Company's offices in the metropolis. Mr. Bell's business, like Mr. McEnnery's, is the handling and release of British features in the United States.

The next film-drama of exceptional note visualizing legendary lore and historic scenery will be "Old St. Paul's," by the Clarendon Company. Details have not been divulged, but I think the film will be about 3,000 feet. The plague of London and the subsequent fire have been reproduced in this picture in most praiseworthy fashion.

A new brand of film will be released in about a month under the name of Regent Films. Mr. Weston, formerly producer for the B. & C. Company, is the leading spirit, and the first subject will be the picture, "Closed on Sunday," described before.

J. B. SUTCLIFFE.

THEATER CONDITIONS IN PORTO RICO.

We were favored short since with a visit of Mr. H. F. Smith, who has been located in Bayamon, P. R., for some years. There are thirty-eight theaters in the islands, mostly small houses. Two film exchanges furnish supplies and films, mostly commercial reels, receiving the larger part of their films from Europe. Very little money circulates among the people, consequently the picture business is not highly profitable, except in one or two houses. However, the business is not hampered with licenses or regulations of any sort and the management of houses and operating rooms could be very materially improved in most cases. Pathe projectors are used mostly.

OBSERVATIONS
BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN

REFERRING to the breaking in upon Broadway territory by photoplay adaptations from standard works, there are many people skeptical as to the success of the movement. They seem to think that the "Quo Vadis?" and "Last Days of Pompeii" successfully passed the test on account of the exceptional individual merits of the works in book form and regular stage productions, and that it will be difficult for other photoplays to follow in their footsteps and hold the people at the higher prices. It is contended that, great as the success of the photoplay has been, they cannot be counted upon as a drawing card in the Broadway field without something else to help them along, such as vaudeville. We will soon learn whether or not such is the case. On Monday last the Carnegie Lyceum became a regular photoplay house. Heretofore the motion picture productions there have consisted of high class travel views. The present program consists of "Les Miserables," a nine reel production, with the evening prices ranging from thirty-five cents to one dollar. While the Lyceum is not a Broadway house, it is close enough to the territory to serve in determining whether the higher price paying amusement public has actually taken up the photoplay, or only bestowed its patronage upon the other productions on account of the subjects forming their basis. Within the next ten days there will be a second test, with the opening of the Vitagraph theater right in the heart of the White Way district.

* * *

Those who have given these undertakings careful thought and are acquainted with the attention to details attending them are quite confident that the up-to-date photoplay will have permanent location in the Broadway district. It would be absurd to expect that the motion picture programs offered in the existing houses could be transplanted and carry single handed the houses that have been booking straight productions. Yet there are many people who entertain the belief that this is what the new ventures mean. To the contrary, the photoplays with which the tests are to be made are feature productions prepared at an immense outlay both as to financial investment and labor. The plays are reproductions of standard works with attention to artistic details that promise to make the presentation of the subjects more effective than they have or can be given on the stage. If such proves to be the case, and an insight to the studios justifies the belief that it will, the photoplays will establish themselves as worthy successors in the Broadway amusement center. They will become distinct attractions and the fact that combination motion picture and vaudeville houses surround them will not be in consideration.

* * *

The notion that the combination houses owe their success to the fact that vaudeville forms a part of the bill is a false one. Those who entertain it either are not in touch with the pulse of the amusement public, or are so biased that they will not accord photoplays the credit due them. Let the stroller along Broadway, where the combination houses are located, watch the people as they approach the entrances and note which announcements attract the greater attention—the vaudeville bill, or the photoplay posters and photographs. Watch and listen when the show is on and see which gets the biggest laugh—the comedians on the stage, or the comedy on the screen. Take the Savoy, Herald Square, and other houses where vaudeville is not shown and see if photoplays have not sufficient strength to carry a house single handed.

The managements of the combination houses should better themselves before it is too late and not be misled by the thought that they are drawing the people because they are giving them vaudeville at cheap prices. It is true that many people who were on the old vaudeville circuits have gone over to the combination houses and are giving good value, but it is also true that some of the vaudeville material lately signed up is of the poorest quality. In one house visited last week there were three acts on the program in which the people appeared to be recruits from cabarets of a very ordinary character. The performers seemed to rely almost entirely upon their flashy costumes. In most instances they appeared either to ignore, or were unable to reach, the people in the balcony and gallery with their voices. It struck the observer that the performers realized that the orchestra was the only part of the house to be considered. Evidently they were so used to ground floor work that they could not play to an audience in a theater. As soon as a photoplay was flashed upon the screen sighs of relief were plainly audible in the upper part of the house. It would be well for some of the managers to sit in the balconies or galleries occasionally and see how near to the truth are the statements made concerning the vaudeville part of their bills. Too many have an ambition to figure as theatrical managers and in their efforts to avoid being looked upon as photoplay house managers try to make others believe that the photoplays are only a secondary consideration with them. They must not discard the old friend for the new. The motion pictures were their stepping stones to their present status and, much as some of them try to get away from the idea, the pictures are still their money getters. The keenest foresight cannot figure the possibility of any of the combination houses ultimately booking vaudeville entirely. But no profound mind is required to see that in the near future most, if not all, of the combination houses will be devoted solely to photoplays. The wise man, then, will see that he gets the best the market affords both as to vaudeville and photoplays. If he does not do this he will ultimately find his business drifting to the all photoplay house next door.

A friend asked recently why the photoplay people were concerned in the class of pictures a house runs, or the fact that some managers were inclined to treat the pictures as inferior numbers on the bills. The reply was that the situation is the same that occasioned the cry recently made by theatrical critics and legitimate managers all over the country against the ruination of the business by inferior productions by free lance managers. People who injure photoplays in the eyes of the public, or try to detract attention from them, must in time injure the business as a whole, and it becomes a duty to let the public know that such people are not real representatives of the photoplay form of entertainment. The market is well supplied with new and good subjects and there is no reason why those who pretend to be exhibitors should not give the public the best, other than the fact that the managers do not wish to spend money in getting them. Their inconsistency is shown by repudiation of worn out vaudeville acts and the presentation of film subjects that are of old issue and scratched and torn by use.

One of the local newspapers quotes Kate Waller Barrett, president of the National Florence Crittenton Mission, as saying:

> I have never seen anything to equal the exploitation of unfortunate girls by so-called philanthropic organizations and up-lift movements, such as moving picture shows, problem plays and so-called saviors of the white slave. * * * We notice that those who are busy getting educated at moving picture shows and theaters are the ones who do the least to stop unfortunate girls and are sadly neglectful in making practical application of all they have learned about the white slave traffic.

There appears to be a ring of sarcasm in the reference to motion pictures as an educator. If such was not intended, there is at least evidence of a false conception on the part of the esteemed lady with reference to the motion picture in that connection. Such pictures as she refers to are no more of the educational class than pictures referring to other crimes. If they were so intended they would be condemned in censorship and few films would be on the market. Such pictures are produced to serve as a deterrment to the youthful, innocent and inexperienced. The people who view the pictures are not supposed to absorb the details so that they may know how the crimes are committed, but to take the effects and results of the crimes home with them and be in a position to evade the pitfalls themselves and help others to do so. It is a process of caution, and not of tuition; and in promulgating it the motion picture is entitled to more credit as an uplifter than is accorded in the quotation.

AKRON, O., TO HAVE NEW PICTURE HOUSE.

R. L. Miller will open a new moving picture theater in Akron, Ohio, to be known as the Majestic. Mr. Miller is installing his own electric light plant. The pictures at the Majestic will be projected upon a 12 by 16 foot mirror screen, which, according to Mr. Miller, will be one of the largest in the state of Ohio. The house will seat 500. Mr. Miller says that there are five new picture theaters in course of construction in his city, and when all have been completed there will be twenty-six photoplay houses in the city.

Long Programs.

CLEARLY something must be done, and that quickly, or the motion picture will be done to death and left, unburied, a rotting corpse, a stench in the nostrils.

Here is a letter from Portland, Maine:

> I was very much interested in the article regarding ten reels of pictures by your "Man About Town" and am inclosing you clippings from one of our dailies to show you what kind of showmen (!) we have here.
>
> The owners of the larger theater are film renters and one of the firm a National Vice-President of the Exhibitors' League. The smaller ad is from a recruit that bought the house mentioned a few weeks ago and will probably learn better after a little experience, but is there any excuse for the owner of the "Big Nickel," and what must the ultimate effect be, when members of our national organization who are bound by oath to protect the exhibitors' interests, take this method of trying to drive out their smaller brother because they have the goods at their disposal to do it with?
> Well might the question be asked, what are we coming to?

This is not an anonymous letter. There is attached the signature of a man who is not ashamed of his name. The first clipping is that of The Big Nickel Theater. The bill lists "The Guerrillas of Algiers," a three-part special; "Where the Road Forks," a two-part American; "The Forlorn Hope," a Kay-Bee two-part story, and four one-reel subjects—eleven reels for five cents—offered by an officer—a National Vice-President of the Exhibitors' League.

Not Alone.

This is just one town in Maine. Here is a letter from Syracuse:

> I read with interest your criticism of the exhibitor of Point Pleasant, New Jersey, who gave a program of ten reels for ten cents, but we have a competitor in this city who outdoes the "exhibitor" spoken of. Our friendly competitor runs a nightly show of twelve reels, comprising the three services, Mutual, Universal and Licensed, for the admission price of five cents. In addition to this he issues prize coupons for Saturday. He is the proprietor of two theaters and holds an interest in a third; the twelve-reel show costs him nothing extra but an errand boy to carry the reels from one house to the other.
> When we opened our theater some eight months ago, the twelve-reel exhibitor was then running four reels. Shortly after our coming he doubled his program to eight. This having little or no effect on increasing his business, he gave cash prizes amounting from three to five dollars a night in addition to the eight reels. Finding this a loss, and his competitor still doing business with four reels only, he secured an interest in a third house nearby, and announced a twelve-reel program in all three houses.
> We have succeeded in making a living from our house despite this cut-throat competition with a four-reel program; but can nothing be done to make these fire-sale, cheap-jack exhibitors see the ruin that will come to themselves, the manufacturers, the exchanges, and the other exhibitors if they continue to offer such lengthy shows? Patrons in the district often state that an hour and fifteen minutes is all the time they wish to spend in the theater, yet this man forces a three-hour-and-a-half show upon them.
> If the exchanges and manufacturers do not soon realize that it will be to their own profit to refuse service to exhibitors of this stamp, their first awakening will come when cancellations of service begin to pour in from theaters affected by this kind of competition. The M. P. Patents Co., who license our house and one of the houses controlled by our competitor, have never taken any action against the latter for violating their rule of independent film in a Licensed house. The exchanges could easily stamp out this evil if the managers would get together and blacklist all such houses, but the exchange managers, some of them, will almost give a service free rather than lose a customer to their rivals.

Just Plain Rotten.

Here is a condition that is just plain rotten. No other word seems to fit. Three houses each take one four-reel service and these reels are chased around to all three houses. The General Film has taken no action through its exchange. The Mutual has taken no action, nor has the Universal, and yet the Licensed manufacturers, the Universal and the Mutual corporations all hope to be in business next year and the year after.

Just as a plain, ordinary, everyday business proposition, the exchange manager who rents his film and gets paid for one service where three are used is as foolish as the liveryman who rents his horse to be driven ten miles and does not complain when the hirer drives it thirty.

But the condition is precisely as we have always maintained. The man who runs an eight to twelve reel show for five or ten cents does so because he has not the skill to make a four-reel show pay. He is trying to replace a lack of ability with inert film.

It is not quantity but quality that counts. Other houses run three and four-reel bills, run real theaters, run the reels properly and make money. Some would-be manager with eyes in his heels and his shoes on, can see nothing but more reels since the public will not have the four he offers, and if four will not do it, eight will or perhaps twelve, or sixteen or twenty, until the Chinese play that runs a couple of years looks like a one-act sketch alongside. And a trio of exchange managers who are no better fitted for their jobs than this manager stand by and regard the murder of their own business and the business of their employers with complacent contempt.

A man almost born in the theatrical business, and assuredly brought up in it, wonders what sort of people these may be.

How Long?

In the early days we didn't so much mind the undertaker who turned manager because he had a lot of chairs that were not used much for dances and funerals and that could be used to fit up a store show. We didn't particularly care about the man who ran a dancing class in the afternoon and a show in the evening. It was all pioneer work, and a lot of these men have since become qualified managers, because they were willing to learn, but to-day conditions are different and it is intolerable that any man who parts his front hair along with his eyebrows and who has to use a magnifying glass to see his forehead can set himself up with a show and ruin not only his own but the other exhibitor's prospects. If he hurt only his own chances it would not matter, but many of the people he drives from his house do not go to other and properly conducted theaters, they are so sickened of the performance they have seen that they go nowhere. They are not familiar with the conditions of the business. They cannot know that the film that fairly shoots through the machine is really a good one when properly run. They only know that the show was unutterably vile and they stay away from all shows, having lost their stomach for photoplay exhibitions of any sort.

The man who runs a trust to ruin his competitor can be indicted under the Sherman act. There should be some legal means of putting these photoplay pirates out of the business in which they have no proper place. In the long run they will put themselves out of business, but how long is this outrage upon an established business to be permitted to last?

We have no objection to any man running twelve reels if he runs them properly and gets a proper price for his wares, although a four to eight reel show is about all the entertainment that the rational theatergoer cares for in one evening, but the same lack of intelligence that leads him to run twelve reels leads him to run them through in a hurry in the hope of getting other people in.

In an early issue we are going to run a series of paragraphs that may be used in programs and other advertising. We believe that in many cases a missionary campaign will be more effective than direct fight, but it's a long fight at best, and discouraging to the man who has the best interests of the business at heart.

Real Shows Scarce.

On the level, a really good show is a novelty, a "for-certain" show that has no lottery annex but where all of the money goes into the program and the house service, where the man who runs the house would rather give his operator five dollars more a week and better his projection than put that much in grocery "seconds" and pass them around. Now and then you find a place like that and when a photoplay fan finds a place like that he decides he is back to the old home at last and he keeps on coming. Make your play for the man of that type and you won't have to worry and you can smile at the Sheriff when he comes along and know he is not after you.

Give a souvenir now and then, if you want to, a post card or a set of cards or something like that, and give each person attending one of these, but don't pick twenty or thirty or fifty favored ones and run a gambling annex. You'll get people into the house that way, maybe, but they are not the stickers, and the stickers who come around three or four times a week are worth more to you than the people who only come when there is a chance to grab off something extra.

The trouble with the average photoplay theater manager is that he only sees the people he gets and not the people he wants. There are about fifteen million people who go to the shows every day. There are fifteen or twenty million more who would go if they could go to a decent house, see decent films decently projected and receive decent treatment. These are the better class of people, the people with some money and a lot of refinement, who want to see pictures in an environment that approximates their own homes. They don't want to enter a place that suggests a reformed billiard and pool parlor and find themselves in a dirty, ill kept place that smells worse than their garbage cans at home, is dirtier than their cellars and absolutely without the little refinements of comfort to which they are accustomed. They do not insist on Persian rugs on the floor, but they like to feel that the boards have seen a broom since seven weeks ago last Thursday and they don't want their clothes used as dust rags for the seats.

This class of people does not demand gift contests; to the contrary they keep away from these contest houses and the sort of crowds the contests bring. They want to mix with their own sort and see an entertainment that is not dusted all over with free flour and pelted with coal and potatoes.

If you want to do something reckless hire half a dozen young women of tact and good address. Let them go to the sections where the solid, respectable citizens live, not the too rich, but the well to do. Let them take the whole territory and let them give out free tickets, explaining that this is "get acquainted week" and that you want them to come down and bring the whole family any night they want to; every night if they want to. It will have to be done nicely, because a crude ticket distribution would defeat the very aim you seek. In some sections the mere announcement that seats were free would pack the house, but these people you want are the people who would not use free tickets that came through the mail. They will "fall" for personal solicitation.

Have a church week. Pick out five of the most popular churches and let them sell tickets, each church having its own night. Break 60-40, the big end going to the church. If you are running the sort of show you should, you'll get many persons who've never been there before but who will come again.

Work the classified lists of addresses, work the educational stunt, work all these special schemes, but keep out of the prize contest, the "free distribution" and all the rest of the bunk.

If the laws of the land permitted the conducting of lotteries, then it might pay you to run something big, but don't be a piker gambler and fool yourself you are a theater manager. You're not a good manager and you're not a good gambler. It's just as easy to build for a good crowd as a cheap one. Start in right. If you can spare any money for prizes, put it into better film service and you'll not only get your money back, but it will keep on coming in long after you've run out of new schemes for prize distribution.

And Party.

There is nothing small about the Majestic Theater, Columbus, Ohio. It had an opening January 12th and sent out invitations that read:

YOU ARE CORDIALLY INVITED TO ATTEND
THE MAJESTIC THEATER
AT SOME TIME
DURING THE OPENING WEEK.

This was on cream paper in brown, the type being surrounded by the thumb-nail cuts of the Vitagraph players. Outside of the fact that Old English was the type selected, the job is a good one. Accompanying the invitation was a post card program of the week's features and an admission ticket that was worded "Admit bearer and party." This is a generous scale of doing business, but it is a good way to handle an opening, since it assured a crowd the opening week and at the same time created the suggestion of liberality in management.

Some Don'ts.

The Gem Theater, Pittsburgh, has had to get up a set of "Don'ts" for the benefit of some of the boys who need a lesson in manners. We particularly like the first prohibition. Just because the price of admission is much less than at the dramatic theaters, the tone of the house should not be lowered and the same standard of deportment should be insisted upon. It is up to the manager to see that this standard is maintained. If there are some few boys of the rowdy type and if they are permitted to make a nuisance of themselves, word will soon be passed that they can have "a good time" down at the Star, or whatever the title of the house may be, and soon the place will become the home of juvenile outlawry and in time not only will the older and more profitable clientele be kept away, but in the end the house must inevitably attract the attention of the police, for increasing license will lead to violence, free fights and a scandal. Here is the list. Use it if you need it, and do not be afraid to enforce it.

Boys, Read This:

The management of The Gem calls your attention to some infractions of the rules of good behavior and good breeding on the part of some boys while in this theater and hereby prints some "DON'TS" which will be strictly enforced in the future. There are some good boys among the regular attendants at The Gem, but there are also some bad ones. These remarks are intended for the latter class.

Don't!

DON'T think for an instant that, because the price of admission is low, you can leave your manners at home. Act just as you would in a high-priced theater or any other place where large audiences congregate.

DON'T neglect to remove your hats as soon as you enter the house. The grown-ups will think more of you if you do so.

DON'T throw peanut shells, paper or other refuse on the floor. If you must eat peanuts during the show, put the shells in your pocket. There is a receptacle on the sidewalk near the Gem, placed there by the Department of Public Works, for the placing of such rubbish.

DON'T whistle or stamp your feet when an exciting scene appears on the screen. Clap your hands to your heart's content, but refrain from the other noises mentioned.

DON'T SPIT on the floor or walls of this theater. The State and city has strict laws against this filthy habit and The Gem management will prosecute all offenders. If you are caught sometime and are taken to the Frankstown avenue police station do not blame the management. We have given all the warning we deem necessary—not only in this medium, but by a slide on the curtain. This applies to men as well as boys.

DON'T talk loudly during the show. It annoys other people.

THE GEM MANAGEMENT.

Are You This Joplin Man?

And on the same lines here is a letter from a reader in Joplin. This is not a letter from a rival manager, but from a "fan" who reads this paper and who naturally turns to us when she sees something wrong. If you do not live in Joplin ask yourself if you could not apply the letter to your own house:

Here is a suggestion that I think if you would put in THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD would do some good.

Do you think that it is fair to the people who go to the show houses to have to sit and have some boys monopolize the house by whistling and shouting so loud that when they are through you cannot hear anything

This is what they do in a Joplin house. A good picture house with a good trade, but I do not like to go there because the manager has up to this date done nothing to stop this.

I like THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD because you have all the suggestions that any good manager should know. Do you find this in other towns or is Joplin in a class by itself? I think myself it is pretty bad.

There is nothing more aggravating than to pay for entertainment and find only annoyance, and the worst of it is that it is all so very unnecessary. The house is what the manager makes it. If he does not know enough about the business to conduct it properly, he should hire someone to run it for him. He has no right to ask the patronage of the public and then subject them to the annoyance of having their pleasure interrupted by a lot of young hoodlums.

If you will show them they must behave and that you mean it when you say so, it will not require a week to clean up the house.

Cleaning Up.

We have seen some pretty bad galleries in our time and we have watched them being cleaned up. For years the Sunday gallery at the Orpheum Theater in San Francisco was a terror to vaudeville artists, but the management decided to change things and a few arrests and convictions, followed by brief jail sentences brought about a complete reformation and the reform was a permanent one.

You may think that if you send a small boy to jail the neighbors will all rise up and boycott you. Use the jail sentence as a last resort, but the entire community will stand by you if you show a disposition to keep your house orderly, and if Johnnie's mother and all her neighbors stay away because Johnnie had to go to the Children's Court, you will find, as an offset, that many more people, who were kept from your house by Johnnie and his little friends, will patronize you now that you are trying to keep your house in order. It probably will not be necessary even to appeal to the police. Watch the house, pick out the ringleader (there almost always is a ringleader) and carry him out. Give him back his admission fee and tell him that you won't have him in your house unless he will behave. Under no circumstances let him return that evening. Solemnly lead him before the ticket taker and the box office girl and ask them to mark him well. Make the whole function as solemn and as impressive as possible and Johnnie will slink down the street scared stiff even if he does vow vengeance. Most boys are decent at heart and will behave themselves if they know they have to. You have only to prove to them that they must behave so long as they are in your house.

If the offenders are older, boys of eighteen or so, you will very probably have to enlist the aid of the police, but the police will be glad to help you.

Make Them Believe in Signs.

In some states a theater ticket is a lease and in others a license. In English this means that if the ticket is a lease, you cannot put a patron out unless he is very clearly too disorderly, since you have leased him a seat for the period of one performance, and a lease may not be revoked. On the other hand a license is a temporary permit and can be revoked by the maker at any time if the licensee is restored the sum paid for the unexpired portion of the privilege. If your lawyer advises you that in your state a ticket is a lease, it will be necessary to print on the ticket that in selling the ticket the right is reserved to refuse admission to any undesirable person or eject any person whose actions are unruly. Then your lease is tempered by this saving clause and a civil suit cannot be brought. If you purchase the usual strip tickets, give a slip of paper with each admission.

Then put up a sign that reads somewhat to this effect.

THE BIJOU

Is a place of entertainment for the intelligent and refined. If you are not prepared to abide by the simple rules of order

DO NOT ENTER

Vary the wording for a slide and then make your patrons realize that the sign means precisely what it says, and you'll be surprised to find that it is simple in the extreme to conduct a house in orderly fashion once you have made plain your intention to so conduct the house.

The amateur nights are largely to blame for an unruly condition. Then audiences are encouraged to guy the would-be actors and the habit once formed extends over to the regular performances.

Your patrons look to you to preserve order. They will regard you with contempt if you do not and so will the young men and boys who make the trouble.

THE PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Phil Lang.

PHIL LANG is as modest about having his photograph printed as a soubrette isn't, but so many editors got after him that at last he had to get in front of the camera himself and this is the result. It seems scarcely necessary to explain that he is the Kalem editor. He is one of the most widely known of the editors and one of the most helpful—if you write the Kalem style of stuff or give promise of being able to do so.

Mr. Lang was formerly a theatrical publicity man, and like a lot of the others he wrote photoplays. About three years ago his clean cut technique brought him an offer from the Kalem Company and he got rid of his cut trunk and his mileage books and settled down to take things easy. Before the work grew so exacting, he wrote about a hundred photoplays; perhaps the best remembered being "The Saving Sign" and "The Maid's Double." Recently he has confined his attention to adaptations, his visualization of "Our New Minister" being his most recent work in this line, though he gives his touch to all of the Kalem productions.

How to Become an Author.

Someone in Brooklyn writes: "How would you go about it to become an author of photoplays?" It's a simple little question, but probably the writer knew that we had to write just so much every week, anyhow.

In the first place, it is to be presumed that wanting to write photoplays, we would have some idea of what a photoplay was like, but the first step would be to study the plays instead of merely looking at them. We would go to the theater as often as possible and to as many of them as possible. We would not go with the idea of gaining enjoyment, but instruction. We would study the character of the releases. We would see what was popular and what was not. We would try and see what it is that made the good stories good and find the reason for their failures, if possible. We think that no matter how well we might think we knew photoplays, that we would find out more in a few weeks than we thought we had learned perhaps in years.

And after a reasonable length of time given solely to study, to the dissection of the filmed stories, we would see what we could do in the line of plots. We would try and write plots of our own, not plays, but just plots, synopses of stories. We would look at these with no favoring eye. We would be our own hardest critics, and we would not be content merely to turn out plots as good as some we saw. We would want to turn out plots as good as ninety per cent. of the output. And all this time we would be reading the MOVING PICTURE WORLD and particularly the Stories of the Films, knowing that much was being produced that we did not see.

If, after six months or so, we found that we were doing promising work in plotting, we would decide to study in earnest, regarding the preliminary work, not so much as a study of the playwriting business as a test of our ability to learn that business.

We would realize the need of a text book and we would realize that more than one book would be helpful, so we would buy as many text books as we could find that we believed to be reliable and authentic. We would not buy every book offered and we would not buy until we had examined the book if we could find one at the public library. We would try and see them all and then buy the ones that seemed to be best.

Having established the library we would study the books. We would not merely read them, we would study them and study them so thoroughly that we could turn to any item without reference to a possible index. We would get so familiar with the text that we would be able to tell that this point about leaders was about a third of the way down a right hand page of a certain chapter and be able to tell the sense of the paragraph without reference to the book at all.

Very probably we should find some conflicting statements in the various books. We would compare these statements and try and see if the differing writers did not really arrive at the same conclusions by different modes of expression. If the teachings were distinctly different, if, for example, one man told us to single space our copy and another declared for double space and each gave his reasons why, we would figure out which advice we thought the better and take that.

And all of this time we would be writing, but now we would write plays from these synopses we had prepared, along with newer ideas. We would put plays together and take them apart, trying to see if they were properly put together. We would write a play and lay all but the synopsis aside. Three or four weeks later we would take the synopsis up and write the play again. Then we would compare the two and see which was the better. Probably we would find that in some particulars each bettered the other. We would make a composite of the two scripts, retaining the best of each, and we would know just why each selection was better than the rejection. We would argue it out with ourselves and prove it to ourselves by the books. Then we would retain the synopsis and put the development away to take up again. Each time we worked this over we would learn something new, and we would be doing this not with one script, but with ten, twenty, thirty even, taking them up in turn over and over again.

And all of the time we would be applying the rules in the books to what we wrote and what we saw on the screen and what we read in the paper, and each time we applied one of the rules we would have a little clearer insight into the construction of plays and of the reasons for doing certain things and not doing others.

And, mind you, all this time we would not be wasting postage stamps sending this stuff to the studios. We would be working for big results and be willing to wait, knowing that those who had found success had gained recognition through hard work. But by now we would feel that some of our stories stood a chance in the studio and we would be ready to try to sell.

We would not sell through sentiment or impulse. We would not send all of our stories to Biograph, or to Vitagraph or Imp or Kay-Bee because we liked the work of one of those companies best. Constant reading would have given us an idea of what each company wanted and we would weigh each script carefully before submission. Our "The Clash of Temperaments," for example, might be just in the Biograph style. True, we would rather sell to Vitagraph and see it played by Costello, but we would know that Biograph made stories along these lines almost every week, where Vitagraph used the style but seldom. We would send first to Biograph as the most likely market, then to Vitagraph and so on down the line until we would lay the story away, waiting a change in the styles.

And if by chance we did make a sale, we would not send everything on hand to the same company. That company, forthwith, should be a valued friend and we would try and give them only our very best, building up, if possible, on the first one they took and never sending them a story that we might think good enough to try elsewhere. They had bought from us. We would not spoil our chances by sending them anything less worthy and we would not send them all we wrote.

And we would not sit down and write a ten-page letter to the editor, telling how hard we had struggled and how delighted we were that he had taken the story and how we hoped that he would buy a lot from us and would he please tell us by return mail just what he wanted most and lend us a couple of old scripts to study, that we might get his style precisely. We might send a cordially formal note of thanks telling him we were glad he had liked our story and that we hoped that he would find others that he liked from time to time. We would not tell him the story of our life, nor ask a single question. We would merely thank him to show our appreciation and then prove it in a more definite way by not burying him under an avalanche of scripts.

And we would not get all swelled up and tell everyone we had just sold a story and that we were going to quit the dreary old job and become an author. We would keep plugging away and giving the boss at the store or office just as good service as though we were not an author, but down in our secret heart we would decide that some day we could "blow the job" and just write and write and write all day long, but we would not do the actual blowing until we had some money in the bank and a good enough standing with the editors to feel that they would keep on buying.

And we would keep on working hard over the little things in the scripts and we would buy each new book that came out, in the hope of finding something we did not know, and if we found just one thing in a dollar book that might lead to the sale of a $25 script, we would not feel that we had been swindled because all the rest was what we already knew.

And we would study, study the screen, and the papers and the books and our scripts until the day our work was done, for there never was and never will be a man who knows it all, and the man who knows that he doesn't know it all will always be that one piece of information ahead of the man who thinks he does know it all, for the man who knows it all will learn no more and make no progress, while improvement is always possible to the earnest student.

That is the way we would learn to write scripts if we started in today. The way seems long and hard and cheerless, and it is, but success will be the sweeter for the effort made and the more permanent because based on a solid foundation and not an ephermal flash of novel ideas unbacked by any well-established groundwork of thorough technical training. We wonder how many have the courage and the patience to make the trip; to write without return for months, or even years.

As to the library, here are some suggestions: Our own Technique of the Photoplay; Writing the Photoplay, by Esenwein and Leeds. The books by William Lord Wright and Eustace Hale Ball, Price's Technique of the Drama, Phillip's, The Plot of the Short Story, and as many bound volumes of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD as we could afford within reason, say six to eight quarterly volumes. There are others, but these will do for a start.

At the Inquest Club.

Through an error, the lantern slide was flashed a full half hour too soon at the Savoy Theater, January 12, and the members of the Inquest Club had an additional half hour at the Morgue. No star witness was present, but there was an animated discussion and much valuable information was arrived at. George Hennessy urged the members to give their whole energy to a script and cited his own early experiences when he gained a standing with the Biograph by giving just what was wanted instead of what he wanted to write. The sobby ending was properly spanked, and to cheer those who had written sob stories, Dr. Stockton told that he had done five happy endings from one story that ended tragically and still had the tragedy on his hands, though the five cheerful tales had sold. The next meeting will be held January 26th. Any person interested in writing photoplays is welcome to join the older members in the lobby of the Savoy sometime after nine on that evening and declare himself in. Five new members entered at the last meeting.

The Kalem Studios in California.

By Marc Edmund Jones.

All scripts for the Kalem Company are submitted to the New York office, at 235 West 23rd Street, and are there purchased for the director, without reference to him in a great majority of cases. All Kalem directors are held to the general policy of the company, and this article, in the main, to be a help to the photoplaywright striving to sell Kalem, must be a statement of that policy. The work and players of the different directors in the California studios will be given, as it will aid in sensing the "atmosphere" of the company's work, but, aside from the comedy, the company is not limited in any way in the matter of settings, location, or players. There are regular producing companies in Florida, New Jersey, and New York, in addition to California, and an entire company will be sent to any location to get the settings for a story that is O. K.'d in New York. One of the companies here is preparing to build a part of the fortifications of a city in India for a Sepoy story, and to go into Arizona to put on a big desert story, while another company here has just completed arrangements to go several hundred miles in order to get a special engine for a railroad story. A company has been sent to Montreal for a single story. Therefore, the statement of the New York office that any kind of a story can be handled may be taken for what it says. There is one limitation, however, aside from the comedy, and that is that the Kalem Company makes nothing but thrilling melodrama, and that only a few single reels are being made. The Kalem melodrama is very distinctive, and readily recognizable on the screen without captions. The thrills are those of situation and business, and more nearly approach the old line melodrama than the work of any other producing concern. Kalem is catering to a certain class of patronage, and their sales are justifying their course. It is therefore folly to try to sell them a story out of their line, and there is a word of warning in the writing of the melodrama of thrills such as they want. Kalem is as particular of the rules of logic, probability, plausibility, etc., as are the companies less fond of the deep-dyed rascal brought to book in the last scene. Through their heroines will stab themselves rather than submit to the machinations of the villain, they are never sensuous, and domestic infidelity is absolutely barred, while gambling and drinking are heavily frowned on. The distinction is subtle. Their melodrama will deal with the depth of human life, but it is always clean—it will be as thrilling as possible, but never ghastly or horrible. The day of this writing brings a script sent back to eliminate a grave in the final scene.

The Santa Monica studio houses the one comedy company. Hal Clements is director and manager, and the company features Ruth Roland and John Brennan. The company has recognized the stampede to the Keystone type of story, and is putting on rough farce, even pure slap-stick, but they run less scenes to the reel than Keystone and are putting on split reels only. They also carry more of the comedy action in the interior sets than Keystone, and do not mind five or six interiors if the action in the sets justifies them. Santa Monica is a sea-side resort, and Miss Roland is a good swimmer. The town of Santa Monica will furnish nearly all city locations, but, as it is 18 miles west of Los Angeles, the company cannot run into the city conveniently in order to get the large buildings.

Carlyle Blackwell has become a director, and is manager of his own studio on Fleming Street, in Hollywood. Louise Glaum is his leading lady. The studio is the old Lubin place, about three blocks from the Kinamacolor that is now Griffith's, and it is the one that was used by Arthur Mackley's Essanay Company last year. It is complete and roomy, and Blackwell is featuring himself in two-reel melodrama exclusively.

The Glendale studio houses three companies. Glendale is about eight miles north and slightly west from the business section of Los Angeles, and is a very modern little city. The studio is back in the hills, where a large tract of land is under lease to Kalem, and two large open air stages are in operation. The hills are splendidly adapted for the military pictures put on here, and there have been as many as six hundred extras before the camera. George H. Melford is in charge, and his company features Larry Payton and either Billie Rhodes or Marin Sais. Paul Hurst, the heavy, is assistant director, and Melford particularly likes to get stories featuring his character people—Wm. H. West and Jane Wolfe. Most of the heavy multiples have been put on with this company. Two four-reel Boer War pictures are finished, and a four-reel Sepoy, and a four or five-reel Arabian desert picture are being started. Between the big ones Melford is fond of underworld pictures. Frank Montgomery, featuring his wife, Mona Darkfeather, and Charles Bartlett, is putting on Indian pictures. J. F. McGowan, featuring William Brunton and Helen Holmes, puts on modern straight melodrama and railroad stories. McGowan likes highly spectacular, dare-devil work.

Handling Leaders.

Here's something new in the matter of leaders:

In framing up the information that must be expressed in the leaders, there is often a choice possible between condensing the matter into one long leader or breaking it up into several short leaders. The first alternative seems to have the advantage of avoiding the interruption of several leaders. The other seems to make it easier for the spectator to really get the necessary information, although it may tend to weaken the illusion. Which is the better way? It may be an unimportant point, but perhaps is among the thousand and one things to be thought of in the process of writing a truly professional script.

Nothing is "unimportant" that makes for a better script. Too long a leader makes for confusion. A single fact at a time is better than a detailed history, but at the same time it is not well to run more than one leader, or perhaps a leader and a cut-in leader, in one scene. Many times a portion of the fact may be pictorially presented if a little more study is given the situation, but where it is a choice between one long leader and say three short ones, each presenting a single fact, we should be inclined to use the three, not in one single scene, but in three scenes made by cutting in one the original scene with two flashes of related action.

But suppose that this is the fact, stated in a leader:

John's mother suffers from heart disease. She is so strongly opposed to his marriage that he fears the announcement of his engagement to Edith will cause her a fatal stroke. He breaks the engagement.

You can trim a few words out of that, without altering the sense, but suppose it is taken this way:

10—Garden—John and Edith on—John proposes—accepted—gives ring. Exits.

11—John's home as in No. 3—Mother discovered knocks book from table—startled—rises—gasps—hand to heart—maid runs in—gives glass of water.

12—Front of John's home—John enters scene—meets Bess—stops and speaks—courteous chat—mothers enters from house—registers alarm—comes forward—Bess greets—exits—mother looks after her—questions John—negative reply—

Cut-in—"You must not marry, John. It would kill me."

Back to scene—hand to heart—John alarmed—helps her into house.

13—John's home as in No. 3—John helps mother in—maid helps her to her own room—John much upset—hesitation—mind made up—he goes to desk—writes—

On screen—second page of letter—

she says it would kill her to learn of my intention to marry. Will you wait, sweetheart, or will you take back your freedom? Whatever your choice, I am always,

Your devoted,
John.

Back to scene—John seals letter—stamps—slowly exits.

Now we have a reasonably brief leader and a part of a letter. The fact is not only stated, but most of it is stated in action and this action clinches that part given as insert.

There is no value in "preserving the illusion" at the cost of clarity, so leader must be used where action cannot be made to do, but it is possible to evade much leader and give the rest in short sections.

Clean.

Write clean stuff. The sensational filth may attract for a time, it may be "what the people want," but the man who lasts is the man who does not degrade his work. A million people a day laugh at our stuff and not a man, woman or child has to blush.

Inquiries

NOTE—No inquiries can be replied to by mail. Look for your answer here. No question can be replied to that necessitates the handling of the manuscript. Always give your name and address. It will not be published. A list of addresses, to which photoplays should be sent, will be supplied on receipt of a STAMPED AND SELF ADDRESSED ENVELOPE. The request should be made to the paper direct and not to this department, nor to the Answers Man.

W. M.—The School you ask for has no address. The proprietor is under indictment for fraudulent use of the mails.

M. H.—Mr. Cummings is with Pathe Freres.

LOIS.—We do not object to the length of your letters. Lafayette McKee was Bruce, in "The Cipher Message." Have not seen Miss Gray cast lately. We lack the dope on the other players. As soon as they connect, the fact will be announced.

W. W. S.—It is not likely that any company would be interested in the purchase of adaptations of foreign plays. Most companies can draw on the material through its studio staffs. The outsider stands a chance only with original work.

W. D. H.—If the vision is in scene three it is a part of scene three. If it is not visioned into the scene, but shown by itself it is then a separate scene with its own number (four in this instance), with "Back to No. 3" for scene five. A separate vision in a scene makes three scenes in all. But it looks as though you lay too much emphasis on exact technique, to the detriment of the story.

W. H. J.—That Imp is not cast, but Miss Jane Gail is generally Jane in Imp productions.

L. McC.—Sorry, we know of several colored ladies in films, but they are mostly black or red. We know of no "Lavender Lady." Perhaps some reader can identify the player for you.

Question No. 18.

Best answer will be published and the names of others sending in replies of excellence will appear in the Roll of Honor. Explicit permission to use the name must accompany each answer, otherwise only the name of the city will be used.

What is the effect of a heavy but momentary overload on your motor-generator set and how much of an overload of this sort would be safe (with relation to capacity, I mean, of course)? What effect has a medium, constant overload? Explain in detail. If you had a motor-generator set, or a generator pulled by an engine, the latter having considerable surplus power, and the generator capacity was 35 amperes, and you were pulling 35 amperes on each of your two projection arcs, and your manager insisted on dissolving one motion picture into the next, or, in other words, one film into the next, what would you do? The generator is compound wound.

Roll of Honor.

There have been many excellent answers to Question No. 12. Careful sifting has narrowed the Roll of Honor down to something more than a dozen. The choice for publication finally lay between Ernest D. Wills, Brookings, South Dakota; C. A. Webster, Comeron, Missouri, and "New Jersey." All three of these replies are splendid, but I have finally selected that of "New Jersey" as being a little the best.

The Roll of Honor is as follows: Ernest D. Wills, Brookings, South Dakota; C. A. Webster, Cameron, Missouri; Fort Worth, Texas; Harold Weiss, Battle Creek, Michigan; Boston, Massachusetts (2); C. L. Dowsley, Winnipeg, Manitoba, Canada; St. Louis, Missouri; Savannah, Georgia; W. Clarke, Jersey City, New Jersey; John Mason, Toronto, Canada; Cleveland, Ohio; Portland, Oregon; San Francisco, California; Chicago, Illinois (2), and L. C. LaGrow, Albany, New York. Vernon Balley, Philadelphia, sent in a splendid reply, but it came too late to be considered for publication, as did also Harry Dobson, Toronto.

One of the Chicago No. 2 men's answer was excellent, as was also that of both the Bosten men, members of L. U. 182. Brother Wills' reply showed extreme neatness and care in its make-up. Brother LaGrow's was brief, but what there was to it was intensely practical.

Reply to Question No. 12.

By W. S. James, Camden, N. J.

The Question:

Suppose the brushes of your motor or generator showed excessive sparking. How would you proceed to locate the trouble, and how would you remedy it? Also suppose there was a ring of fire which extended clear around, or appeared to extend clear around a d.c. commutator, what would you conclude the trouble to be, and how would you remedy it?

The Answer:

If the brushes of my motor or generator showed excessive sparking I would attribute it to one of the following causes: (1) If belt-driven, the belt might be slipping. If the sparking was spasmodic or intermittent, the trouble would probably be found in the belt, since belt slip causes sudden variations in speed and this will in itself cause sparking, since it has the effect of fluctuating the voltage. The remedy is to tighten the belt, or to use belt dressing. (2) Brushes not correctly set, that is to say, the rocker arm is too far one way or the other; also the brushes may be too close together or too far apart. In the first case the remedy is to move the rocker arm until the neutral position is found, whereupon the sparking will cease. If this failed to remove the trouble, I would then see if the brushes themselves were the correct distance from each other. In a two-pole machine they should be directly opposite each other. Considering the commutator as a circle, the center of the bearing of each brush should be where a straight line drawn through the center of the circle would bisect its circumference. If it be a four-pole machine with two sets of brushes (four brushes altogether) the correct distance to set them is one-fourth of the circumference of the commutator between the centers of adjacent brushes. If it be a machine with more than two sets of brushes (more than four brushes all told) then divide the number of commutator segments by the number of poles, or field coils of the machine, and the result will equal the distance, in commutator bars, the brushes should be apart. (3) Dirty brushes or commutator may cause sparking, and some of the causes of dirty brushes and commutator are as follows: (a) Carbon brushes contain a small amount of paraffine and when the carbon gets warm this paraffine is likely to ooze out and stick to the commutator, partially insulating it in spots, or the paraffine may mix with carbon dust and coat the end of the brush with a semi-insulating compound. If copper brushes are used they may become clogged with a mixture of oil and dust; the obvious remedy is to clean the dirty parts. To clean the commutator use a stiff brush—one stiff enough to remove any foreign matter which may cling to the commutator, but not stiff enough to injure the surface, after which put some vaseline on a piece of canvas and fold the canvas with the vaseline on the inside. Now hold the outside of the pad thus formed against the commutator when it is revolving. By this method there is no danger of getting too much vaseline on the commutator. If it is a carbon brush which is dirty, raise it just enough to slip a piece of sand paper between the brush and the commutator, with the sand side against the brush, and pull it back and forth until enough of the brush has been ground away to insure a clean surface. Be sure and always clean the commutator after doing this, since the carbon dust adhering may possibly work its way into the insulation between the segments and cause a local short circut between two bars. If the brush be made of metal then take it out, clean thoroughly with gasoline and trim it up with a file if necessary. (4) Brush not making proper contact with the commutator. This may be due to (a) the tension spring not being strong enough. (b) Tension spring having lost its temper. (c) Brush stuck in its holder. (d) Brush not fitting the surface of the commutator. (e) Brush holder set at the wrong angle. The remedies are: (a) Stretch the spring, if it is a spiral one, or, if it is not a spiral one, do whatever is necessary to make the spring stronger. (b) Put in a new spring, and, since the fact that the old spring has lost its temper is evidence that the spring itself is carrying too large a current, reinforce it with a current carrying jumper. (c) The remedy is obvious. (d) Use sand paper as before described until the brush fits the commutator surface. (e) Straighten the holder. There should, however, only be sufficient tension on the brush to insure its making good contact with the commutator. Be careful and don't get your springs too strong, since then you will have unnecessary wear both on the brush and the commutator, which will, to some extent, add the element of mechanical heat, generated by undue friction between the brush and the commutator. The reasons for the brush sticking in the holder are: (a) Dirt in the holder. (b) Brush not true. (c) Hammer that rests on the brush not working true with the slot in the end of the brush. (Only true, I think, with certain types.—Ed.) The brush should slip freely in the holder but not free enough to allow of any play, and the hammer should be so adjusted that it lies true in the slot at the end of the brush. A brush which is not true may be evened up by tacking sandpaper on a perfectly flat surface and rubbing the brush thereon until it is true, (5) Commutator worn too thin. If the commutator wears down too far, although it may wear evenly and appear to be in good condition, the brushes will spark in spite of anything that can be done. The reason might lie in the fact that, the segments being wedge shape, as they wear down they become narrower and thus allow the brush to span more of the circumference of the commutator than was intented, or there might be a slight error in the setting of the brush holder, and this error becomes greater as the distance between the brush and the commutator increases. The only remedy is a new commutator, but the sparking may possibly be lessened somewhat by moving the brush holder closer to the commutator. This trouble appears at its worst in a series type machine. (6) A high or a low commutator segment. This fault may be detected by the clicking sound made by the brush in passing over the defective segment. If the segment is low the brush rides in towards the shaft each time the bad bar passes under it. If it is high the brush will jump. The remedy will depend somewhat upon the case. It may be that the segment has become loose, in which case the bar may be driven back into place by tapping lightly with a wooden mallet or by using a wooden block, but the armature will probably have to be taken out and sent to a repair shop, unless you yourself can tighten the clamp ring—a rather delicate operation. If the segment is high by reason of the fact that, being of harder material than its mates it has worn down more slowly, then, using great care and a fine file, it may be dressed down. If, on the other hand, it is low, then the only remedy is to turn down the rest of the bars to match. If the fault is slight this may be done by removing the brushes and holding a piece of grindstone which has been previously turned out to fit the circumference of the commutator, while it is revolved rapidly. This process is, however, slow. The best way is to put the armature in a lathe and turn it off. The grinding may, however, be done with the brushes down and the machine working. (7) A rough or eccentric commutator. This may be caused by improper care or by use of defective materials in its construction. The rough commutator may be detected by merely feeling of it. The mica insulation between the segments will either stand out in ridges or be worn down so that there is a small groove between the segments. The eccentric commutator may most readily be detected by holding some instrument firmly against the frame opposite the commutator so that its end just touches the bars; if the commutator is true it will touch all the way round as the armature is slowly revolved, but if the commutator is eccentric it will, of course, only touch the high spots. If the eccentric be bad it will cause the brushes to move in and out in their holder slightly when the machine is running. The only remedy is to turn the commutator down. (8) High resistance brushes, the evidence of which is the brushes getting very hot and slowly crumbling away at the end next to the commutator. The remedy is, to get good brushes. (9) Low bearings. In some types of machines low bearings will throw the armature out of center sufficiently to distort the magnetic field, and this will cause sparking. The evidence of this fault is that the air gap between the armature and the pole pieces will be smaller at the bottom than at the top. The only remedy is to replace the bearings. (10) A short circuited armature coil. This trouble may be located by holding a piece of iron to the end of the armature while the machine is running. There will be a slight jerk as the defective coil passes the iron. (I question the practicability of this test, except on a very large, low speed generator.—Ed.) The voltmeter will also fluctuate badly. The coil may be shorter within itself, or there may be a connection between two adjoining commutator segments. The remedy is to locate and remove the short. (11) A reversed armature coil. This may be located by holding a compass over each coil of the armature in turn and sending a direct current through the coil (with the brushes raised, and with resistance in series, I presume.—Ed.) That coil which causes the compass to turn in the opposite direction from its mates is the guilty party. The remedy is, reverse the connection or direction of the windings of the defective coil. (12) A bent armature shaft. This, of course, is made evident by the whole armature wobbling. The only practical remedy is a new shaft, since it is seldom practical to straighten a bent shaft perfectly. (13) Overload. The most prominent sympton of overload is the armature heating all over. The sparking may be lessened, but not entirely stopped, by moving the brushes ahead on the generator or back on the motor. By ahead I mean the direction in which the armature is revolving. The remedy is obvious. Get a larger machine. (14) High speed. High speed sparking is caused by the brushes not being able to make proper connection with the commutator. I think the causes of excessive speed in motor will probably be one of the questions asked, therefore, will not go into the details here. (15) A weak field. A weak field on a generator may be detected by its inability to "pick up" readily and by a failure to maintain normal voltage. On a motor the starting power is decreased, but the speed and current is increased. A weak field may be caused by any one of the following: (a) A loose joint in the iron circuit (magnetic circuit, I presume the brother means.—Ed.). (b) Heat may lower the insulation of the field winding sufficiently to allow the current to short circuit through it. (c) There may be a metallic short in the field coil. Remedies; With an ammeter in the circuit, test each field coil and the one pulling the most amperage is the defective one, but if all read the same then there is a loose joint in the metallic circuit. (16) A shaky foundation or anything else which causes vibration will set up sparking, the only remedy being to stop the vibration. With regard to the second half of question No. 12: A ring of fire is caused by an open circuit in the armature. This may be by reason of a break in one of the armature wires itself, or one of its connections with the commutator, and these may in turn be caused by excessive current burning off one of the wires, or a nick in one of the wires, or the commutator may become loosened and break off one or more of the leads. The defect may be readily detected as the mica will be eaten away from between the segments to which the faulty coil is connected, and the segments themselves become full of holes and burned at the edges. If this trouble be caught in time the open may be closed and the commutator turned up true. Sometimes, on account of carelessness, or abuse or overload, the armature becomes hot and causes the solder on the connections of the commutator to soften. The centrifugal force will then throw the solder out of the slots of the commutator connections and they will become defective, which causes the commutator to become rough and black, with the mica eaten out from between the segments. In this case there are no actual opens, but the action is the same, so far as the ring of fire is concerned. If any one of these faults is caught in time it may be remedied. If not, it will be necessary to install a new commutator and perhaps a new coil. Also a bit of copper or other current carrying connections between two commutator segments will, although it won't effect the two segments in question, have the appearance of a streak of fire around the commutator.

Russell Pastil.

Harry Bowman, Jr., Greensboro, North Carolina, says some very kind things, winding up with:

> Have noticed nothing further from Brother Russell as regards his pastil. Must we come to the conclusion that it was merely a noise, and nothing else? If Mr. Russell cannot produce the goods he should not have raised our curiosity as to the merits of the same.

I have heard nothing further from neighbor Russell. Either he tried to put one over on the department, or else he thought he had something and did not. Let us, with charity to all and malice towards none, conclude it was the latter.

Trouble.

W. C. Allen, Antwerp, New York, has difficulty, as follows:

> Am using a motor-driven Power's Six-A machine taking 110 volt 60-cycle current through a B. & M. coil. We are having trouble blowing the 60-ampere fuse located in the first switch box, between the meter and the outside transformer. Also, we have burned out two coils within the past two weeks. You will observe from the sketch > that our wires come to us from a transformer just outside the building, entering a switch located inside the operating room. This switch, being of the heavy type, is protected with a 60-ampere fuse. The one on the right is the one which blows. The machine circuit is protected by a 45-ampere fuse. Our wires are all rubber covered and every wire in the building is in conduit. Will you please tell me what makes this one particular fuse blow, and why the coil should get so hot?

(1) A ground on wire A somewhere between the main switch and the 45-ampere fuse switch with a corresponding ground in wire B between the main switch and the transformer. (2) Something wrong with your coil, causing it to deliver too much current to the lamp, or else a heavy ground on the secondary circuit. I do not know anything about the "B. & M." coil or what its capacity is. However, if it is a choke coil I would advise you to get a low voltage transformer (economizer, inductor, etc.). The first thing is to test your wires for ground. You will find the method of doing so on page 106 of the Handbook. Connect a copper wire to some known ground, such as a water pipe, being sure that the metallic contact is good, and then touch the other end of this wire to the wire to be tested. If there is a ground you will get a spark, and by its strength or viciousness you can judge something of the strength of the ground. I think that is about all the advice I can give you, except that it is of course possible you have a coil wound for a lower voltage than the current you are using. If you don't find any ground I would have the power house people test the amperage of your machine circuit, and if they find it is excessive, then the coil is at fault. Connect an incandescent lamp into your test wire.

Brother Johnston Criticised.

Seattle, Washington, writes:

> Thanks are due you for the help you are giving us through your department. I have never before been one of its correspondents, but as I am ordering a Handbook I could not resist accepting your invitation to discuss Messrs. Johnston's and Dowsley's answers to Question No. 5. In the first place I don't think I would like to have Mr. Johnston design a generator for me, using one-third of the total output for field excitation, as I am sure such a dynamo would have a very low efficiency. A shunt wound generator, as a rule, shows a higher pressure than its rated voltage at no load, and furnishes rated voltage at rated amperage or below. On an overload the voltage falls off very rapidly, due not only to an increase in the counter magneto-motive force, but also to the decrease in field flux as the voltage is lowered. If the field voltage were kept constant, as in a separately excited generator, the decrease in voltage would be gradual; that is, the voltage-ampere curve would approach a straight line. I cannot agree with Mr. Johnston in the case cited, that "You immediately reduce your voltage to zero," since the voltage would fall off only to such a point that the resistance of the arc would be no longer overcome when the circuit would be broken and the generator would again build up to no load voltage. You take exception to Mr. Dowsley when he starts his curve at zero amperes and 110 volts. I believe this is due to the fact that you were considering armature current while Mr. Dowsley was undoubtedly considering external current. In my opinion the union, while a splendid tool with which to better conditions, nevertheless displays entirely unnecessary selfishness towards fellow workmen, as I have observed in several cases recently. I wish you the best success in your good work.

Seattle's comments are clear and to the point. Personally I don't know what percentage of a shunt wound generator's output is used for field excitation, but it seems to me as though one-third is, as Seattle says, pretty high. I am going to refer this particular matter to the General Electric Company and find out authoritatively just what is what in this particular matter. These discussions are valuable and I want any of the correspondents who find what they believe to be errors in the answers published to correct them. Discussion of that kind teaches the readers much faster than they can be taught in any other way. By-the-way, let me say that I have decided to incorporate a series of questions on gas, gasoline and kerosene engines. This, in view of the fact that they are rapidly coming into use in moving picture theaters, and will come more and more into use as time goes on.

Answer Criticised.

Philip Glaser, Huntington, West Virginia, contributes a very excellent answer to Question No. 11, which, however, was the same as No. 10. He then says:

> Regarding the replies to Question No. 5, by W. L. Johnston and C. L. Dowsley, I cannot say that I entirely agree with Mr. Johnston when he says the cause of the drop in voltage by the reason of an overload in a shunt-wound machine is due to the magnetism of the armature counteracting the magnetism of the field. When a compound-wound machine is overloaded the armature magnetism increases the same as in the shunt-wound, and still the voltage does not drop, and the field does not change or become stronger in order to prevent counteraction. The field is always the same, because whatever extra current is pulled through the series is stolen away from the shunt, then why does not counteraction make the voltage drop in this case? In a compound-wound machine the armature causes the neutral point to change its place on an overload, and thus causes sparking, and if the field of a shunt-wound machine was separately excited I believe that is all the overload would cause; the fuses would go, of course, but the voltage would not drop. In a shunt-wound machine the overload robs the shunt winding of most of its current, since current always follows the path of least resistance, therefore, when the shunt field is robbed of current and the field awakens, then the armature magnetism starts to counteract and kills the weakened field. My opinion is: I don't believe that counteraction is the primary cause of the drop in voltage, because it does not do so in a compound machine where the field stays the same, and I do not believe it would do it in a shunt-wound machine if the field did not weaken first. I may be wrong, but I don't think I am.

Now, gentlemen, I don't want you to get into an extended argument on this particular matter, for the reason that it is purely technical, and we might get into a very extended and large space-consuming controversy. I have written Brother MacClellan, of the General Electric Company, Schenectady, to give us the authoritative dope in this matter, and he has very kindly done so, as follows:

> In reference to W. L. Johnston's reply to this question, beg to advise that Mr. Johnston's letter is not quite clear and really does not explain or describe just what happened under the condition assumed.
> Of course you understand that an ordinary shunt-wound generator should never be used for moving picture work, in the first place. This does not refer to some specially-designed shunt-connected generators for moving picture machines. A regular shunt-wound generator of 3½ kilowatts, 110 volts, would have a current capacity of about 32 amperes, and should not, if properly designed, lose its voltage at a slight overload of 3 amperes, even with the field rheostat unchanged from its no-load setting. At no-load and normal load voltage of 110, the rheostat resistance has a certain value, and if this resistance is kept the same and the line current is increased the voltage will decrease, for two reasons: The CR drop, due to armature current, reduces the terminal voltage; and the armature reaction tends to annul the magnetic flux produced by the field coils. These effects tend to reduce the excitation voltage impressed on the field coils, and, therefore, the voltage will continually fall as the current increases. This will continue until the field flux drops to a certain critical value, when the machine voltage will die out. The maximum current obtainable under this condition should be considerably above the normal rated value. Therefore, it will be seen that the current should by somewhat more than 35 amperes on this capacity generator before the arc would go out. By cutting out resistance of the rheostat as the load increases, the voltage, of course, may be held constant and the characteristic curve at its start would then be a horizontal line. The maximum current would be higher than if the field rheostat were not changed. In all cases a rise of temperature with increased load reduces the voltage because the field rheostat resistance rises with the temperature and the field current becomes less, just as if a resistance were added to the field circuit. The trouble from drop in voltage could be overcome by making the machine compound-wound, but I do not believe that this would work out unless each field coil were compounded. Mr. Johnston states that it is not necessary to wind all the field coils, and this is another point on which I disagree. Each coil should be wound with several turns with such size conductor as is sufficient to carry a line current: probably 10 turns per coil would be enough to compound the machine flat at 110 volts. This would need to be determined by experiment. If too many turns were added, or the machine over-compounded, adjustment for flat compounding could be made by shunting some of the main current out of the winding. Mr. Johnston's statement that the field coils are always wound for one-third the total output of the generator, is not quite right. In any case the winding should be designed to meet the conditions of the magnetic circuit and give the required terminal voltage at full load current, and cannot be said to have any definite relation to the kilowatt output or capacity of the generator. The field windings would in general be different for different machines, but the output alone is not enough to determine the capacity of the windings in any particular case.
> Mr. Dowsley's reply to this question states that the heavy current in the line probably steals some of the current from the fields, and thus tends to demagnetize them, lowering the voltage. This is partly true. The fall in voltage is really due to current in the armature, which produces a magnetic effect in opposition to the magnetism of the fields. This weakening of the fields reduces the armature voltage, and, therefore, the terminal voltage is less. The field current will then be less and the magnetism will, therefore, be further reduced. This lowers the voltage still further, and as a consequence the machine voltage may die out completely. All depends upon the conditions of the magnetic circuit and the design of the armature and the field windings.

We have to thank both the General Electric Company and neighbor MacClellan for giving us the right dope on this proposition. It may be a little technical, but I think it will be understood by most operators, and I am sure both brothers Johnston and Dowsley will be glad to be set right by an authority which may not be questioned.

The Feline Escapes.

When Brother Kaho, of Trinidad, Colorado, informed us that he could make drawings on raw glass, presumably without any special preparation and with an ordinary pen, we gravely arose to our feet and addressed the audience with sundry remarks tending to cast doubt upon Brother Kaho's statements. In an unpublished letter Neighbor Kaho took strenuous exception to our remarks. He did not say, but very plainly intimated his opinion that we were a thun-of-a-gun, and accused us of having called him a liar. But we did not change our opinion, and now Brother Kaho comes across with a sample of a special pen he uses, and says:

> Take the enclosed quill point pen and place in holder just as you would any pen point. Then with a silk or common handkerchief wipe off the glass on both sides, after which bind the cover glass on top, bottom and both sides with paper binder strips. Uncork the India ink (thanks for the lobster, we were going to jab the pen point through the cork but for this timely information.—Ed.). Dip quill point in the ink (again many thanks.—Ed.), and write or draw any design, but don't press too hard on the penholder.

All of which bears out the editor's contention which simply was that raw glass could not be successfully written on with an ordinary pen and without any special preparation. The pen point submitted is a very fine one and I find that by using it the ink does not spread at all and friend Kaho's contention is to that extent entirely correct. Any kind of writing or drawing could be done on carefully cleaned raw glass using this pen point and India ink, therefore, let us bury the hatchet, take off our war bonnet and return to the paths of peace. Oh, yes, by the way, we most emphatically did not call Brother Kaho a liar. Far be it from us to be so rude. We merely said that friend Kaho did not tell the truth. That was absolutely all there was to that charge.

New Orleans Improving.

New Orleans, Louisiana, contributes the following:

> In a former letter you may remember I said something concerning the poor projection in a certain house. Projection in this city has, as a whole, improved somewhat since then, but I regret to say that the particular house in question has not made any improvement whatever. They run so called features about two years old, and, along with the pictures, a very poor vaudeville act. We have two rival companies in this city who own ten houses between them. The Pearce Circuit is the largest, and they were the first moving picture exhibitors in the South. Their first house is still in operation, and the best one in New Orleans now is owned by them. It is called the Tudor, and is equipped with the only pipe organ we have in a New Orleans moving picture theater. They also have a very pretty theater called the Trianon. Their houses all use Simplex projectors. The other company is "The Fichtenberg Enterprises." One of their theaters, called the Victor, runs nothing but features. They have a new house, the Plaza, but in my estimation it is altogether too small. In their Alamo I think the operator puts on, from all points of view, what may be considered the best picture in New Orleans. I am neither an operator or manager, but just a young fellow who loves the movies, and who reads the MOVING PICTURE WORLD from cover to cover. I have an ambition, however, to be an operator some day.

I am glad to be told that projection in New Orleans is improving. I hope your ambition to become an operator will some day be realized, and that you will be a good one; but let me advise you to take the right course and serve an apprenticeship of at least six months, and preferably a year or more, meanwhile studying the technical side of the business. That is the only right way to become a real operator.

Flashes of Light.

C. W. Miller, Prescott, Arkansas, writes:

> I am having a little trouble I cannot account for, viz.: Flashes of light on my screen at any speed, though I notice it more when running fast. Using 60 amperes a.c. and a two-wing shutter; with a three-wing shutter the flashes show up worse. Please tell me what size shutter to use with a 4½-inch lens. Throw 54 feet. Kindly inform me how to measure a shutter.

Evidently your trouble is travel ghost. The reason it shows up more with a three-wing shutter than with a two-wing shutter is that, according to your sketch, the three-wing shutter main blade is 4¾ inches, while the two-wing blade is 5 inches. The trouble may be due to worn gears, thus allowing too much circumferential play in the shutter shaft. I would suggest that you get a soft leather strap and put it around the shutter spindle, between the bearings. Now get a light weight of some kind, say, at a guess, two or three ounces and attach a hook to it; next punch a hole in each end of the strap and put the hook through the holes. This is designed to act as a brake on the shutter, and its effect ought to be to throw your travel ghost all either up or down. You can then set your shutter so as to eliminate the ghost, and I think with a two-wing shutter you won't have any further trouble. To measure the necessary shutter blade width you should make a paste-board shutter blade, the main blade wider than your present one, put it on the machine, and then keep cutting a little off the main blade until slight travel ghost appears, after which cut out your metal blade one-sixteenth of an inch wider and you will have it right. But if you try to eliminate travel ghost on a machine that has badly worn gears by making the shutter blade wide enough to cut out the ghost, providing no brake is used to steady the shutter, you will not only cut a large percentage of the light, but will be likely to produce a heavy flicker.

Hum: Mebby So!

W. L. Johnston, Toronto, Canada, springs the following:

> I notice, November 15th issue, in commenting on an article from Brother James, Camden, N. J., you invite discussion on color effects obtained with ordinary film. I think Brother James is an experimenter like myself and I believe I have tried about everything possible in the way of a color scheme, as well as all kinds, makes and brands of shutters, and, while I will undertake to make a shutter which will give a flickerless picture on d.c., using a storage battery floating on the line with very low voltage and lots of current and big carbons, I cannot say, so far, that I have had any large amount of success with the color proposition. Doubtless Brother James has heard of the following (doubtless he has not.—Ed.), but perhaps he would like to experiment with it. There is a successful color process for ordinary still pictures, though it is yet only a laboratory proposition; it consists of the following: It is well known that when a film is exposed and developed the developing solution eats out certain salts in the emulsion, leaving a film, which to the feel is of the same thickness throughout, but which in reality is of varying thickness. Now, when the positive of this is held up to the light with a backing of silver close to it (not a mirror with a piece of glass between, since that would spoil it), and the whole is held to the light, the light waves passing through the film are reflected back, and in going through the different layers of emulsion the light is split up into its original colors, the same as it was when the picture was taken, and you see a natural color photograph absolutely perfect. Now, why could not the light from your arc be made by a series of screens to exactly resemble sunlight and, using 200 or 300 amperes (searchlights for military work use more than this), project the light against the film, using a silver plate reflector in the aperture window, causing the reflection to pass through the stereopticon lens, where it would have all its original colors. I hope this severe case of brain storm will not give you heart failure, and assure you I do not have many such attacks.

Brother Johnston then springs one about sounds, but we will save that. I think what he has already said is sufficient for one time. Possibly what he says is true in so far as the color proposition is concerned. I don't know. However, I would suggest to Brother Johnston that if he turned a concentrated light of 200 or 300 amperes on a film and a silver mirror I think the film would last about as long as it would take him, working fast, to say "scat," and the mirror would not last very much longer either. You certainly would have some heat there, my boy—some heat. However, what you have said is interesting and, purely as an experiment, will doubtless be welcomed by some of our readers.

Film Buckles.

Marshall Miller, Waterville, Kansas, after setting forth his approval of the department at some length, says:

> I have been working with my Edison for some time, endeavoring to get rid of a buckling of the film. By this I mean the film arches out over the aperture, bringing the center farther away from the lens than the sides and bottom. I have tried adjusting the tension springs, and have installed a new aperture plate, but Mr. Trouble is still on the job. I have also tried putting the films in a can, allowing them to absorb moisture, but that does not seem to produce results, even though the process be continued for over thirty hours. In December 13th issue you said it was impossible to use an electric bell (the 10 cent kind) on the lighting circuit, but I think you took the wrong view. I believe the inquirer meant to ask if such a bell could be used on 110 volts in any way. That kind of a bell can be used if sufficient resistance be connected in series or in shunt. The questions are sure great, and have got me studying.

So far as the bell is concerned, Brother Miller, you are perfectly right. However, it would be a pretty costly way of using a bell, since the wattage consumption would be very high, and, by the way, I am not so certain about that either, because it seems to me that for an infinitesimal period, at least, the bell would get the full voltage, and that kind of a bell is not insulated for any such pressure. I am not positive, but after all I think I will stand by my former answer, though I admit I may possibly be in the wrong. As to your film trouble: If you have a new aperture plate in and your springs rest squarely in the aperture and the springs themselves set straight up and down, that is to say, are equi-distant from each other throughout their length, then the only thing I can say is that in some way the aperture was pulled out of true when you fastened it on; in other words, the screws have bent it out of shape, but this is exceedingly unlikely with an Edison aperture. I think probably the trouble lies in your tension springs, one or the other of them not setting straight up and down. Examine them and see.

An Error.

Some weeks since I used a complaint made by a rejected applicant to Local Union 253 Rochester, New York, to point out the injustice of asking an operator to assemble a projection machine. I am now in receipt of a very nice letter from this local, in which they say that I have been unjust; that the man in question was not asked to assemble a machine, or any other questions which a good operator ought not to know, but that he gave some foolish replies to very simple questions, as evidenced by several examples submitted in the letter.

The editor had no intention of being unjust to Local 253, or even of taking the union to task. He simply used the complaint as a convenient medium by which to point out what he believes to be an error that is committed by more than one union in its examination of applicants. Am glad to know that Local 253 was "not guilty," and I hereby offer them one gallon of apologizes mixed with two bushels of wishes for a Happy and Prosperous New Year, seasoned with a good measure of improvement in projection, and topped off by a healthy growth throughout the year.

Slide Making.

B. J. Stern, New York City, writes:

> Under the heading, "How Slides Are Made," page 171, January 10th issue, you ask readers to stand forth and I now take pleasure in "standing forth." With reference to the making of lantern slides, a 4 x 5 plate camera is the handiest for that particular work. For copying an announcement or photographs of any sort a plate holder should be fitted with a mat, called a "Kitt," which reduces the plate holder from 4 x 5 to lantern slide size. The object is photographed in the usual way, but where a kitt is used the ground glass of the camera should have the mat size traced upon it so that the object can be properly centered and focused within the prescribed space. The negative is then developed, fixed in the usual way, washed and dried. It is then placed in a 3¼ x 4¼ printing frame with the emulsion side up, first brushing the surface with a camel hair brush. The lantern slide photographic plate (positive) is then placed emulsion side down upon the negative, first also having brushed its surface carefully. The exposure is then made and the positive is developed in the same manner. For making lantern slides for out-of-door scenes, moving objects, etc., use a 3¼ x 4¼ plate which has a fast emulsion. Lantern slides are best made by contact print, the large or reducing camera only being used where it is desired to condense the whole of a large negative on a lantern slide, or vice versa. Slides may be colored with any transparent colors.

Brother Stern sends a beautiful slide of himself, presumably made by himself. We are indebted to him for the information given. He gives developer formulas, etc., but that, I think, is hardly necessary, since any good developer ought to answer.

Slide Coating.

George H. Sullivan, Fall River, Massachusetts, sends a sample of an exceedingly neat announcement slide made by himself, together with the formula for the coating used. We have, however, given so many slide coatings of late that we cannot just now spare space for more. Brother Sullivan recently passed the Massachusetts Motor License examination and says that he was treated fairly by the examining authorities. He then says: "I am buying that special Imperator camera outfit for local pictures from the Motion Picture Camera Company. They have referred me to you. What do you think about it?" Inasmuch as the Motion Picture Camera Company has not submitted the camera to this department for examination, it should not refer you to me. This department does not endorse anything until it has been proven to the editor that the device in question is all that it is claimed to be, or at least is worthy of commendation. There was a review of the Ernemann "Imperator" camera by Hugh Hoffman on page 58 of the issue of January 3, but what connection there may be between the Ernemann "Imperator" and the Motion Picture Camera Co.'s "Imperator" does not appear in your letter.

Neat Slides.

Pennsylvania sends in a very neat sample of a slide he has made by removing the emulsion from the lower half of a song slide, coating the clear glass with yellow ochre mixed with water and a drop of glue. He traces the lettering on this with a lead pencil. Then an ordinary phonograph needle is fixed in the rubber end of the pencil and he traces the lettering on the coating with the point of the needle. He also sends a sample of a slide written on clear glass with Stafford's White Show Card Ink; it shows up very well, but works better if the glass is heated. Pennsylvania winds up by saying that the law enacted in Seattle is—well he calls it names.

Agrees With Us.

Joseph E. Boden, Cumberland, Maryland, encloses 25 cents for the questions and writes:

> This offer (sending the list of questions) is, I think, the best you have made yet. It is, in my judgment, one every ambitious operator should take advantage of. I wish also to say that I am heartily in accord, not only with some, but with all of your policies pertaining to projection. I hope some day to see them all go forward to success.

Your kindness is appreciated, Brother Boden, and I think you will, in the fullness of time, find that the policy of the projection department will win out.

Operators Are you perfectly satisfied with the results you get on the screen?

"THE MESSAGE OF THE SUN DIAL" (Edison), January 20.—This picture will charm by its fine Florida backgrounds as well as by its story, which is that of a girl who quarrels with her sailor lover. Under an old sun dial she finds a diary of 1862, in which is told the story of another girl who had a misunderstanding with her lover; the latter entered the army and was killed. The girl of to-day loses no time in mending matters with the naval officer. Several dissolving views show what happened in war times.

"THE CONQUEROR" (Essanay), January 20. Here is strong drama with a thrilling denoument. Ruth Stonehouse, as the sister of crook brothers, is convincingly natural in her work. William Bailey is strong as the bully and Bryant Washburn as the near invalid does well.

"THE CARD OF MYSTERY" (Lubin), January 20.—Short comedy, written and produced by Arthur Hotaling. The picture made fun.

"MATCH-MAKING DADS" (Lubin), January 20.—On the same reel is this bit of comedy in which an old theme receives one or two new twists.

"INSECTS THAT MIMIC" (Pathe), January 20.—Very interesting close-up pictures of small life well photographed by Raymond L. Ditmars, of the Bronx Zoo. There were views of the giant weevil, cane-headed locust, leaf winged locust, walking stick and the walking leaf of Malaysia.

"SUBMARINE MYSTERIES" (Pathe), January 20.—On the same reel are several views, tinted, of small underwater life, which complements the first half of the subject.

"HER GUIDING SPIRIT" (Selig), January 20.—Had no attempt been made to make move the lips of the spirit there might have been a chance of getting this picture over. A man may be influenced by the memory of a person, and that memory may be vivid. We have the ghost figures in pictures to indicate this fact. But when these figures talk, when men write letters and show them to the figure, the illusion is not only dispelled but the situation is ridiculous. Again, we see a man already drunk sit down to a card table and drink a tumbler full of whisky. A little later he arises with all the money in the party. This situation will not appeal, as a poker game, to those with even a limited knowledge of cards; they will be inclined to describe it as a miracle. Furthermore, a girl who will take back, on an overnight reformation, a lover rejected for drunkenness and loose living and then seal her folly by immediately marrying him is taking a mighty long chance. E. A. Martin is the producer of the picture.

"THREE PAIRS AND A CAT" (Pathe), January 21.—It happens in an apartment house and the cat is singing on the back fence at midnight. "Pairs" may refer to shoes or to people. If people, two of the pairs live in the house and the third, a man and a woman in partnership, visit on "second story" business. Then there is a pair of detectives and some cops. If to shoes, one pair is thrown out of the window and one found in the pocket of a "jolly" husband by his wife who comes in even later. Soon wifey finds the second story woman and there's more trouble. A good deal is made of it and even the reviewer had to laugh. The players do very well, indeed. A good popular release in every way.

"AT HOME WITH THE HERON" (Pathe), January 21.—On the same reel with the foregoing this bit of natural history. These Pathe science offerings are all of merit, but the photography of this, while clear enough, is not so good as usual.

"LOVE'S OLD DREAM" (Vitagraph), January 21.—A Bunny-Finch with plenty of brand new and laughable situations; but nearly everything in it is funny and the audience got good, hearty laughter from it, as a whole. Roy McCardell, the author, deserves credit for fresh fun and his script has been well produced by George D. Baker. That photographer who develops the breach of promise picture deserves credit for his contagious laughter. A good release in every way.

"THE UNCANNY MR. GUMBLE" (Edison), January 21.—Mark Swan, the author, has utilized a real idea and made a farce with substantial meaning. Mr. Gumble, excellently played by Julian Reed, in a cartoon make-up, is a drawing come to life. The artist, Augustus Phillips, is in love with a girl, Gertrude McCoy, and does comic newspaper pictures for money. The love story is skillfully handled and we sympathize with it. Neither the girl nor his artist friends like his new comic work and, getting on his nerves, it comes down from its paper and follows the poor artist all over, disgracing him and making some fine situations. Bliss Milford, as the servant girl, does good work, as does Charles Ogle and others in the support. Ashley Miller produced it.

"THE CHARMED ARROW" (Selig), January 21.—From an artistic viewpoint and leaving out the comedies, this picture is by far the best to-day; it is very beautiful. The most credit belongs, we believe, to the producer, Fred Huntly; but Miss C. B. Winsatt has written a fresh and thoroughly fine love story, tragic but full of consolation in its sincere poetic ending, which is separated from the main part of the story by two or three marvelous ghost scenes. The photography is important here and is perfect. The acting, too, is beyond reproach. Mabel Van Buren plays the Indian girl and later the girl on the beach. Joe King plays the hero as Indian and white man. A. D. Blake is the medicine man. A very desirable offering.

"LOOKING FOR TROUBLE" (Essanay), January 21.—There is a good deal that's new in this broad farce and it gave a good deal of amusement to a large audience; that's about all that can be said.

"MONTE CRISTO UP TO DATE" (Melies), January 22.—A pleasant little comedy enacted by a French cast, the scenes being laid at Chateau d'If. Leo Martin, who becomes a degree too familiar with the wife of the custodian, is locked in Abbe Faria's cell. After some amusing scenes he plays ghost and retaliates on the custodian. Some artistic photographic effects are achieved and there is a pleasing historical interest in the settings. An entertaining number.

"A NIGHT ON THE ROAD" (Essanay), January 22.—A film story that is rather obvious in plot and a little slow in development, though very well acted. The young man stops at the inn over night and is saved from robbers by Carmelita, daughter of the inn-keeper. The atmosphere of the production is good and the later scenes work up considerable excitement. Rena Valdez and Fred Church are in the cast.

"A FRIEND IN NEED" (Selig), January 22.—Quite a cheerful offering in which Jimmy Donovan organizes the cowboys and helps them win the broncho busting contest prizes, thus clearing off the mortgage on the ranch. The opening scenes failed to establish the relationship of the characters very clearly, but later the story picks up in interest and proves quite entertaining.

"ANNE OF THE GOLDEN HEART" (Vitagraph), January 22.—This is a Western offering of characteristic settings and photography that is none too clear in places. The story proves quite powerful in its way, rendered so mainly by the fine performance of Anne Schaefer as the woman of the dance hall, who gives up her love for the sake of the young girl. There is a good deal of genuine feeling in this story.

"THE SENTIMENTAL SISTER" (Biograph), January 22.—In this rather slight story two interesting young girls leave home when their father threatens them with convent life. They procure work with a young sculptor. The elder sister, who is very sentimental, falls in love with him, but the sculptor prefers the younger. The scenes are interesting, but the story lacks any powerful moments.

"DECORATION DAY AT OLD SOLDIERS' HOME" (Vitagraph), January 23.—Views of the national home for Civil War veterans at Sawtelle, Cal. The grounds surrounding this institution are very beautiful and the soldiers are seen marching; also decorating the graves.

"THE PERPLEXED BRIDEGROOM" (Vitagraph), January 23.—This shows how a clever young bride outwits the detective who has a warrant for the arrest of herself and her spouse. Maurice Costello, Clara Kimball Young and James Young are the principals in this amusing little comedy. On same reel with above.

"DOC YAK, THE MOVING PICTURE ARTIST" (Selig), January 23.—This shows Sidney Smith and his funny cartoon character, Doc Yak. The drawings are of the animated type and bring out many audible snickers from the observers.

"AT LAST THEY EAT" (Kalem), January 23.—John E. Brennan and his pal appear as two tramps in search of food. The appliances for ejecting hoboes in the tramp-wise town were amusing. Their appearance as actors finally brings a shower of eggs, vegetables and other edibles.

"UNVEILING THE PILGRIM FATHERS' MONUMENT" (Kalem), January 23.—A topical number, depicting a number of events in England, all excellently photographed and worth seeing. On same reel with above. A pleasing split reel.

"THE MOTH" (Lubin), January 23.—A brilliant picturing of the pathetic plight of a beautiful young girl who marries for riches. Her husband is an old man and when a younger man falls in love with her, she is unable to resist. Then, when her husband dies after some exciting scenes, the young man casts her away from him. Sincere acting and excellent photography make this a strong offering of its type.

"THE HUSBAND'S EXPERIMENT" (Biograph), January 24.—A story within a story; the first very slight and showing us a husband who, to try his wife's loyalty, left her in the charge of a friend while he went on a journey. On the train he reads in "Don Quixote" of another foolish husband who tried the same, and hurries home to find that friend and wife have bored each other to sleep. The substantial part of the picture is the story that he reads, played in graceful costumes and full of charm, but rather unconvincing. The prettiness of it will be liked.

"UNITED IN DANGER" (Edison), January 24.—A wholesome and very pretty romance, with an actress as its heroine and a multi-millionaire as its hero. The liveliness and sincerity with which it is pictured makes it fresh and it will most certainly be a popular offering. The author is Gertrude McCoy, who also plays the heroine's part, opposite to Augustus Phillips, and her personal charm in no little degree makes the offering what it is; but it is most truly a producer's picture and the artistic perfection of its scenes is worth special commendation. Ashley Miller produced it. The acting is fine throughout.

"BRONCHO BILLY AND THE BAD MAN" (Essanay), January 24.—With clean, broad humor that is at once caught by all, this story of our old friend pleased. The acting and general production lends freshness even to old situations, and as a whole it is as good as new.

"EXPLOSIVE D" (Essanay), January 24.—A military melodrama with an old plot handled freshly and produced in unusually convincing scenes. The acting, too, is of a quality that pleases. An acceptable offering.

"THE BLINDED HEART" (Lubin), January 24.—Partly from its perfect photography and partly from the picturesque way in which its scenes are handled this picture satisfies our senses for what is dignified and pretty. The story, too, appeals to homely, human sentiments and sympathies quite in keeping with the quality of its scenes in and about a substantial farmhouse. It is not a new story, this of the husband who was almost lured away from his plain, home-loving wife by a more brilliant woman from the city; but as Arthur Johnson and his competent company act it, it is so filled with new suggestions that one never thinks that he has seen it in other pictures. It is a thoroughly popular and most likable offering. Emmett Campbell Hall is the author, and it was produced by Arthur Johnson.

"THE RETURN OF JACK BELLEW" (Vitagraph), January 26.—A picture not quite up to Vitagraph standard in either story or acting, although the players themselves are pleasing. This is the first time we have noticed Jane Novak in pictures. She is too young to be experienced, especially in sorrow, but has an engaging smile. The story is of the sea; is not fresh or dramatic, or convincing, but has a few excellent sea pictures. Robert Thornby is both author and director.

"HIS FIREMAN'S CONSCIENCE" (Biograph), January 26.—A little story of railroad life along ordinary lines. It is not dramatic or convincing, but these pictures of railroading have a following and even the weak ones seem to please a good many. The acting and photography are clear and fair.

"THE LOVELY SENORITA" (Edison), January 26.—What was by far the larger part of the audience got a satisfying amount of amusement from this film. Without plot and along often used lines, it has William Wadsworth as a comic character in whose behavior there is a good deal of fresh fun. He is ably supported by Mabel Trunnelle in this, the second of the "Wood B. Wedd" series, written by Mark Swan and produced by C. Jay Williams.

"PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 8," January 26.—Scenes from the Mexican border, with winter pictures from Montreal and many other items make a good topical this Monday.

Licensed Specials

"THE VAVASOUR BALL" (Vitagraph), January 20.—This fine two-reel subject is notable for several factors. By all odds the best is the character work of Van Dyke Brooke as the Jewish pawnbroker. It is straight portrayal. Mr. Brooke makes of the pawnbroker a kindly old man, strict in business and worshipping his daughter. Leo Delaney is the playwright and Norma Talmadge is his wife, who pawns her necklace when her husband tells her he cannot afford to buy her a new gown for the ball. Ada Gifford is the daughter of the pawnbroker who from her father's safe abstracts the necklace that she may wear it to another ball. All do splendid work. Mr. Brooke is also entitled to the credit of directing the production. The staging is done with unusual care, the scenes of the ball and the settings of the pawnbroker's shop and home being especially praiseworthy. The story holds all the way and contains many dramatic moments. It is written by Francis Livingston.

"WHO WAS GUILTY?" (Cines), January 20.—It is assumed there was intended to be an air of mystery about this plot. A crime is committed and two are suspected. In the beginning one feels that it would have been impossible for the drunken of the two to have done the deed, in spite of the fact that he is the one arrested. The denouement proves the surmise to have been correct. So many characters are introduced and so many steps are taken to uncover the guilty that at times the action is mystifying. The picture is well staged and photographed.

"THE PALEFACE BRAVE" (Kalem), January 21.—There is sincerity in the love story of this picture that is pleasing, but taking it as a two-reel offering the production is weak. Its whole first reel is devoted to stating the situation that makes the love story of the second understandable. It is rather unconvincingly acted and seems drawn out. The acting of the love story by Chas. Bartlett, as the white-Indian grown up; by Mona Darkfeather, as the Indian girl, and by Eva Smith, the white girl to whom the villain, Pedro, has taken a fancy, is both natural and pleasing. But the melodrama is decidedly overdrawn, too much so for an early morning audience on Fourteenth Street that made marked fun of it. Later on in Thirty-fourth Street it went much better.

"A SWORD OF DAMOCLES" (Patheplay), January 22.—A powerfully worked out two-reel number, with Eleanor Woodruff, Irving Cummings and Gerald Harcourt in the cast. In the story the successful operatic composer, who has lost his touch, buys the rights of a score from a broken down composer. This he brings out as his own composition, but the real writer of the score comes in during the performance and exposes the miscreant, who kills himself with the hanging sword. This is finely photographed and sincerely presented; it carries conviction in every scene. A good offering.

"THE MAN FROM THE WEST" (Lubin), January 22.—Picturesque Western settings and clear, striking photography first make an agreeable impression on the observer in this two-reel number. The story itself, by Romaine Fielding, piques the interest by its highly romantic tinge, and while it is not at all times convincing, proves very entertaining. The Man in the story is a dominating Western character who saves the girl from bandits and later comes to her home in the East and bears her away in spite of the opposition of others. The Western settings were admirably chosen and as a whole the production is very pleasing.

"THROUGH THE STORM" (Essanay), January 23.—One of the best two-reel railroad stories shown in a long time. The plot develops naturally and has fine suspense; the photography is clear and pleasing. The rain storm was well pictured. This is exciting and yet at the same time not so improbable as the average offering of this type. The opening scenes, in which Francis X. Bushman, Beverly Bayne and Baby Garrety appear as the happy family, were very pleasing indeed.

"THE NECKLACE OF RAMESES" (Edison), January 23.—This three-reel number plunges at once into an absorbing story. The first scene is in Egypt, 2,000 B. C., depicting the death of Princess Ameena. The next scene shows her as a mummy, still wearing the sacred necklace, in the Metropolitan Art Museum, New York. The necklace is stolen and the rest of the story has to do with an interesting chase through England, France and Italy to recover it. The plot itself could have been told in two reels, but the splendid views in Paris, Venice, Rome and other cities make the longer production desirable. Marc MacDermott, Miriam Nesbitt and Rex Hitchcock are in the cast. A fine scenic number.

"GOD'S WARNING" (Patheplay), January 24.—A queer story in two reels. It is melodramatic and has little punch. Its best asset is the beautiful scenes full of the charm and dignity of good breeding. The acting, too, is of high order and it makes much of the situations which are good through most of the picture, although the logical sequence from one situation to the other is full of unconvincing weaknesses. There are some Alpine scenes fairly well photographed and the interiors are perfectly pictured.

"HEARTS OF WOMEN" (Vitagraph), January 24.—In many ways a very well written picture and with several most effective situations as the story approaches its climax. It is, however, weakly introduced. The burglar incident harmed the picture's opening and also its end, where it is the cause of an unconvincing speech. It would have been tremendous in one reel, for its author, Shannon Fife, shows not only authoritative imagination, but experience in fresh plot building for the screen. William Humphrey and Tefft Johnson produced it together, and it has been strongly played by Julia S. Gordon as the housekeeper, who secretly loves the master, naturally played by William Humphrey. This man has married his ward, played by Naomi Childers, charming in appeal and fairly strong—who secretly loves her husband's cashier, Hoyt Westcott, a weakling, convincingly acted by Gladden James. There is good emotional stuff in it and it will be liked.

"THE ADVENTURES OF KATHLYN," No. 3 (Selig), January 26.—Most entertaining is the adventure pictured in this number, especially on account of its strangeness. We cannot deny that this series is making a hit even hampered as it is by the continually broken story; its East Indian scenes give it a better chance than a more ordinary offering could have. Take, for instance, those pyres along the River Ganges with their real human corpses being burned, how they add to the mimic scene later when the heroine is compelled to be "suttee." And after she has escaped, not convincingly, the atmosphere of that ruined temple where the lion prowls about among the broken pillars and the defaced effigies of old gods, adds much to interest in it all. The personality of Kathlyn Williams fits this story perfectly. The photography is commendable. The spectators watched this installment very closely.

"THE SHADOW OF GUILT" (Kalem), January 26.—A two-part offering giving a melodrama with a sensational fire scene at the end when the villain loses his life. The characters were introduced a bit awkwardly and it tended to confuse them at first. Doane, for instance, was brought in long before he was wanted in the story. It is a story made wholly of stock situations, but has been skillfully put on. A fair offering; it would have been stronger in less space.

Independent

"THE SECRET LODE" (Kay-Bee), February 6.—This Western offering has a villain who is a villain indeed. He succeeds in causing trouble between rival claim owners and forges challenges on both sides to a duel. He then shoots one of the duellists in the back and casts the blame on the other. This is more ingenious than the average Western offering and has plenty of action.

"THE COLONEL'S ADOPTED DAUGHTER" (Kay-Bee), February 10.—A Western number in which Anna Little appears in her old role of Indian girl. She is adopted as a papoose by the colonel. Later her father, Black Cloud, leads an attack on the fort and she gives up her life to save him after he has been captured. A strong offering of this type.

"TWIXT LOVE AND FLOUR" (Nestor), February 6.—The quantity of flour used in this film must have been prodigious. The characters appear through a fog of flour and wallow in flour, and what love is born, seems to issue from the flour. The fun is of the rough-and-tumble kind.

"A RACE WITH DEATH" (Rex), February 5.—An auto racer carries his wife with a sick child in her arms in his car, succeeds in bringing the child to a surgeon's office in time to save its life and at the same time wins the race. That the path of the race and the road to the doctor's happen to be one and the same, is rather much of a coincidence. But accepting this, the story is fairly good and the race is well presented. The starting of the cars is an excellent scene.

"LOVE AND POLITICS" (Joker), February 4.—A low comedy number, with Max Asher in the lead. The make-ups are funny and the entire offering is a good one of the strictly slapstick sort.

"GETTING RUEBEN BACK" (Crystal), February 10.—Belmont appears as the father of the fascinating Pearl, who is besieged with admirers. The complications in the particular offering are only fairly amusing.

"BALDY BELMONT PICKS A PEACH" (Crystal), February 10.—In this half reel, which is shown with above, Belmont answers a matrimonial ad. He draws an attractive girl, but the boarders dress up a man to fool him. Fairly entertaining.

"AT THE POTTER'S WHEEL" (American), January 24.—A love story of porcelain makers with some educational quality. The story is very melodramatic, but though well acted is a bit obscure. The hero is an artist vase maker; the heroine, a painter of porcelain, and the villain is the master potter. The latter goes to his death in a sensational way from a high window and it looks realistic.

"A RIOT IN RUBEVILLE" (Majestic), January 31.—A farce comedy with some burlesque and some broad rough and tumble humor. The village constable discovers on the posters put up for a coming barnstorm attraction that the villain's face is that of a criminal wanted for wife beating. He fails to see him when the troupe gets off the train, but there he is in the show all right and he starts things. There are some comic characters and it will make laughter.

"THE ELEVATOR MAN" (Thanhouser), January 25.—This story lacks punch, but it is pretty and well acted and has a pleasing character in the old elevator man who, after serving many years, knows something about the people he is taking up and down every day. He meddles to good advantage in an office love story with a less trite ending, the offering would have been very likeable indeed.

"PUT YOURSELF IN HIS PLACE" (Frontier), February 7.—In this film story a young husband holds up a banker in order to get money for his starving wife and child. This raises a moral question which has been treated frequently in novels and stories. Later Jim saves the banker's daughter from death and is forgiven. A fairly entertaining offering.

"ANIMATED WEEKLY, NO. 98" (Universal), January 21.—Views of the Catskill Aqueduct, Lincoln Beachy doing aviation stunts, ski-ing in Norway, border scenes and Hy Mayer's drawings occupy prominent places in this number.

"SLIM BECOMES AN EDITOR" (Frontier), February 5.—When the creditors of the Bungville Bugle begin pressing the local newspaper for funds, Slim buys it out. As the citizens have decided to hang the next editor, he and Mollie find themselves in trouble. This is moderately funny Western comedy, fairly well acted.

"THE VACANT CHAIR" (Princess), January 23.—Full sympathy cannot be given the normal spectator to anything morbid. In this picture, the old grandmother who makes memories of the dead tyrannize over the living will not be wholly popular. The story deals with her cure through her love for her grandson, but until this begins the come out, it has an unpleasant taste and the whole picture suffers from her keeping the dead daughter's place always set at the table and her not allowing any other to occupy it. It is well acted, but the direction might have made entrances and exits in a few scenes less awkward. The photography is clear and it is, as a whole, fair.

"THE MAN WHO SLEPT" (Victor), February 9.—This story, by Lois Webber, with Eddie Lyons in the title role, has a strong kick in it and ought to be well received. It tells of a young fisherman who drinks too much on his wedding day, falls asleep in his boat and almost brings about a tragedy. A good production.

"LOVE AND POLITICS" (Joker), February 4.—A political comedy, by Hampton Del Ruth, with Howard Hickman and Laura Oakley in the leads. The scenes are located at Universal City, during the election of Miss Oakley as chief of police. A breezy offering with a love story attached.

"THE GREATER DEVOTION" (Nestor), February 11.—This is a well-balanced, clearly presented drama of Mexican hildalgoes and a poor peon, who proves that his hopeless love for a pretty senorita is greater than that of her husband and a disappointed rival. The peon finally murders the husband, who has been abusing the girl and she then marries the rival.

"IN WITHERED HANDS" (Powers), February 13.—A picture written and produced by Edwin August, who also has the leading role in it. The story is of a boy who leaves his old mother with her withered hands, wrinkled by the hard work she has done for him, and goes to the city, where he is successful and forgets her until he is reminded by the wrinkled hands of another character, whose place in the story is not perfectly clear. The picture, as Mr. August acts it, has a watery sentimentality. It is acted with skill not only by him, but by his support. There are many very pretty scenes in it.

"HIS ROYAL PANTS" (Nestor), February 13.—If it is just a trifle rough, there is fun in it and it isn't offensive. An Indian prince comes to town and society girls are in a flutter to meet him. We are shown how much respect is paid to his pants and then a tramp steals them and is chased so he has to slip them into a box, just from Paris, that sits in front of a modiste's. They are bought by a young woman and worn to the reception to the prince. He can't speak English and the girl thinks he is making love to her. The changes are rung on the situation cleverly.

"AN ACADEMY ROMANCE" (Powers), February 9.—A very neat programme announcement, containing the names of the cast, precedes this picture. It is a light romance, with a summer camp of military cadets as an attractive setting. The plebe turns the tables on his tormentors by making them think his sister is his sweetheart. They all propose and are rejected in turn. A pleasing feature offering with which to vary a heavy programme.

"A BLOWOUT AT SANTA BANANA" (American), January 26.—A farcical picture of a good time on the Fourth of July at a Western town. There is hardly any plot, but it possesses something of the quality of a yarn and has in one or two places some suspense for a moment, although nothing much happens. Much of it seems to have been made at a real celebration and there is much going on in the nature of horse races, greased pole and greased pig contests and fancy riding, etc., all of which are as good as could be. The photography is fair. It won't arouse any enthusiasm, but it will amuse.

"MABEL'S BEAR ESCAPE" (Keystone), January 31.—This is truly a scream; no ordinary human being could help laughing over it, and especially over Mabel Normand's being chased by a very lively bear. It is the best picture of its kind we remember, and the two half-grown bear cubs that are used in it are the funniest animals we have seen. Here is a very desirable laugh maker.

"MAKING A LIVING" (Keystone), February 2.—The clever player who takes the role of nervy and very nifty sharper in this picture is a comedian of the first water, who acts like one of Nature's own naturals. It is so full of action that it is indescribable, but so much of it is fresh and unexpected fun that a laugh will be going all the time almost. It is foolish-funny stuff that will make even the sober minded laugh, but people out for an evening's good time will howl.

"TOO PROUD TO BEG" (Reliance), January 30.—Made fresh and human by excellent acting, this little story along well-trodden lines amply vindicates itself by being better than all its forerunners. It will exert an emotional appeal and will be liked as well. Spottiswoode Aitken plays an old man wrongly suspected of theft, and in one scene in a bar room with free lunch he has done a bit of exceptional work, but it is acted all through well.

"OUR MUTUAL GIRL NO. 2" (Reliance), January 26.—This week it is hats that are advertised and the story opens a melodrama which is carried over to the next picture. Norma Phillips puts burlesque in her drawing of the country girl and truthfully it is crude. All the appeal of those first scenes is gone. The melodrama, left unfinished, looks very interesting. The photography of some dock views in New York obscured an important point by making it necessary for us to guess that the hero is aware that the self-called count is a crook. Some studio-made cheering at the Yale-Princeton football game at New Haven, of which some fine views are included, is decidedly weak.

"THE GOOD IN THE WORST OF US" (Eclair), February 11.—A new face appears in this two-reel drama, that of Belle Adair in the role of secretary to a ruined bank president. She is a good actress and has a pleasing personality. There is much else to recommend this story, although the last part of it is slightly marred by a lack of clearness. The scene in which the girl shows poker hands through a radiator so that her sweetheart can avenge the wrong done her boss in Wall Street, is well staged.

Independent Specials.

"O MIMI SAN" (Domino), February 5.—A strongly developed Japanese subject, with Jap actors in the leads. The costuming and garden scenes are excellent. The plot is given up entirely to Japanese affairs of state, and has to do with an effort to overthrow the Crown Prince. The scheming brother commits hara kiri after the defeat of his plans. The later scenes, following the death of the Shogun, picture the parting of the Crown Prince from the gardener's daughter. A picturesque Japanese number.

"THE BRIDE OF MYSTERY" (Gold Seal), February 10.—Francis Ford and Grace Cunard appear in this melodramatic story of a beautiful young dancer and cabaret habitue whose conduct is a profound mystery to all who know her, until it develops that she has been living for many years under the hypnotic influence of a professional criminal. The thread of this story is interesting to follow and leads to a very exciting finish. A well-planned three-reel production and it gets over in good shape.

"IN THE FALL OF '64" (Gold Seal), February 3.—Grace Cunard and Francis Ford play the leading parts in this two-reel drama of the Civil War. Some battle scenes occur and there are exciting moments in the story which tells how a Southern girl outwitted a troop of Union soldiers. These war pictures are always appealing.

"A NEW ENGLAND IDYL" (Broncho), February 4.—This two-reel film story, written by W. H. Clifford, is so well constructed that it shows us the development of three complicated love affairs without confusion or lack of interest. The scenes vary between the city and Peaceful Valley. The will left by John's mother was quite original in its terms and causes considerable difficulty before they are complied with to the happiness of all concerned. An entertaining offering.

"A ROMANCE OF THE SEA" (Broncho), February 11.—A two-reel number, which parallels Stevenson's "Treasure Island" in certain respects. It proves a very entertaining adventure story, with a band of pirates to stir up trouble for the captain and his wife. The scenes on the barkentine were particularly lively, and following the mutiny there is plenty of excitement until the treasure has been found and safely gotten aboard the vessel. A good yarn of the high seas.

"INTO THE LION'S PIT" (Powers), February 6.—Edwin August produced and plays the lead in this two-reel drama laid in days of ancient Rome and containing many pretty costumes of that age and rather pleasing settings. Dropping the heroine, a Christian girl, into a den of lions is rather melodramatic and not altogether as convincing as it might be, but on the whole the story holds the interest and some acting appears. The pictures are very good.

"KING, THE DETECTIVE, IN FORMULA 879" (Imp), February 5.—An original two-reel number, with King Baggot and Jane Gail in the leads. The roof garden scene was very pleasing and furnished a novel setting for the death of the would-be homewrecker. The mystery is developed in a clear-cut, simple manner and explained in an equally lucid way; the acting is straightforward and sincere. The double exposure effects were obtained in a convincing way and one that did not seem forced or unreal. This is the best of this series we have seen.

"THE VAGABOND SOLDIER" (Bison), February 7.—A three-reel number, written by Phillip Walsh, with Wm. Clifford and Phyllis Gordon in the leads. The fighting scenes between the British soldiers and the Afghans are brilliantly staged, but we would not swear to the local color, which is undoubtedly not correct in some details. The plot, which concerns a will written on the battlefield, is novel and exciting. The first reel closes at an opportune moment. The scenes in the second reel are back in civilization and quite melodramatic, but the interest is sustained. Clifford's story was interesting but seemed extraneous. The photography is excellent and the production as a whole meritorious.

"THE WOMAN PAYS" (Thanhouser), January 27.—A three-part offering, with some tremenduous situations that will be effective in their appeal to audiences; for, although the method of arriving at them is not wholly convincing, the producer's art appeals to our emotions and in doing so distracts our attention from the means used. We see this innocent society woman helpless with deep pity, but her weakness is harder to sympathize with, the more because another half hour's struggle would have righted her. This weakness is a bit unpleasant in a picture that does not deal with true life. Maude Fealy is featured in the leading role, with James Cruze as the villain, and both are about as good in their parts as we could ask. There are numerous incidents in it filled with convincing realism and the whole is a credit to its producer. But it is not a story that can be wholly fortunate on the screen. It is harder to make an essentially weak story convincing on the screen than on the stage.

"THE HERMIT" (American), February 2.—A two-part picture, dealing with broken love and working out to a reunion after many years. The hermit, who is the story's hero, tells his story to chance motorists, among whom is his niece, daughter of the heroine, whom he had loved, but whom his villainous brother stole from him. She recognizes the story. The main situation is fairly piteous, but it doesn't convince strongly. The ending is effective.

At the Sign of the Flaming Arcs

By George Blaisdell.

THE rest is silence! The utterance of the undying words of the dying Prince of Denmark marked the passing from the New York stage of Sir Johnston Forbes-Robertson. In his reading of the phrase there was indicated more than the art of the actor. There were in the words a literal significance that affected the player as it stirred the great audience. It had been a remarkable evening, remarkable even in the metropolis, that of Saturday, January 24th, at the Manhattan Opera House. Nearly four thousand admirers of Forbes-Robertson and Gertrude Elliott, his American wife, gathered to do honor to them on the occasion of their last joint performance in New York. The program was one of unusual quality. First there was Act I of Jerome's "The Passing of the Third Floor Back." Then came Scenes 2 and 3 of Act I of Shaw's "Caesar and Cleopatra," followed by Scene 2 of Act III of "The Light That Failed." The finale was the entire fifth act of "Hamlet." There were repeated curtain calls after each performance, and in one instance the applause continued long after the star had begun his preparations for the following act.

Such was the mood of this great audience when the curtain rose after the death of Hamlet. On the stage was grouped the entire company. Banked against the throne of Denmark were wreaths of gold, silver and laurel and of flowers. Formally presenting these appeared David Bispham, J. Hartley Manners and Rabbi Stephen S. Wise. There was prolonged applause when one of the speakers referred to the star as the greatest English-speaking actor, if not the greatest in the world. Much stress was laid on the fact that the Englishman had produced only the best, that he had steered a straight course, and that at no time had he been in any measure influenced by decadent tendencies. Rabbi Wise summed up the feelings of all present when, in his final words, he said: "Good-bye the player! Hail the man!"

Forbes-Robertson was plainly affected as he faced his audience. "I don't know how to begin," he said, "but I have got to say something. I think it is only fair to tell you that it is only about three hours ago that I had any idea this was going to happen—that I should have to stand on this stage and listen to all these beautiful words. I hadn't dreamed of such a thing, and, naturally, I am not prepared, ladies and gentlemen, to do the situation even meager justice. It is a moment to me full of beautiful feeling, of joy. These gentlemen have said so many wonderful things that I am overwhelmed by their eloquence.

"It has been said that perhaps I may have been of a little use as an unofficial ambassador between the two great countries of Great Britain and America. I sincerely hope so. If I have added one strand to the cord that tightens us together I shall be a proud man indeed, for ever since I first visited these shores seven and twenty years ago, I have felt that the men in the streets of London and New York will eventually have to stand together. As time has gone on I have watched the growth of mutual affection until I believe we are indeed brothers and sisters in our heart of hearts. It is not possible for me to attempt to thank you for the beautiful tribute which you have so suddenly bestowed upon me, inspired in such beautiful fashion. It is good to have the good opinion of your brothers and sisters. I am indeed proud of the sentiments expressed by the players and the dramatists."

There was hearty applause when Sir Johnston announced that his retirement did not include that of his wife. When quiet was restored the actor said feelingly: "That is better than sweet music to my ears. I hope that many times yet she will have the honor of appearing before a New York audience."

The marvelous voice of the player had been a bit husky during his speech, although in perfect condition during his performance. "I have been suffering from nervousness for the last three or four days from thinking over what I should say to you to-night," he said with a smile, "or how I should say it. You will understand how proud I am on this occasion." He referred with feeling to the seventeen weeks of his engagement, "with audiences silent and attentive, the silence so dear to the actor as it is to the preacher. Ladies and gentlemen, I bid you farewell. And yet, although it is my last appearance in New York, I will say only God bless you and good night."

On Thursday evening, January 22nd, on the invitation of the Gordon Brothers Amusement Company, a large audience assembled in Carnegie Lyceum to witness the first showing in New York State of the nine-part Eclectic production of "Les Miserables." Present were a hundred ministers, many from Barnard College, and persons representative of all walks of life, as well as the newspapers. Richard Henry Warren, choirmaster of the Church of the Ascension, was at the keys of the specially installed Moller organ, and by his musicianly work added to the charm of this wonderful picture. For wonderful it is. Here is a story containing what men competent to judge have declared to be the greatest character in fiction Surely the man who essays to name a greater than Jean Valjean undertakes a large task. The work of Henri Krauss, in the role of Jean, is of the sort that lives in a man's memory long after he has seen the picture. It was a remarkable opportunity Mr. Krauss had. The accomplishment matched the opportunity. Nine parts make a long production, but "Les Miserables" holds tight all the way. When at the conclusion one of the women was told that three reels had been cut out of the picture she replied with indignation: "What a shame! Why did they do that? It might well have been longer. Did I like the organ? Yes, it was splendid—when I heard it; but to tell the truth, I was so absorbed in the story I believe half the time I did not hear the music."

Alkali Ike has got a new name. Augustus Carney will in the future be known as Universal Ike. He's just the same old Ike, nevertheless. Had a squint at his "Universal Ike's Wooing," set for release on February 25th. It's a go, all right. There will be many laughs in it. The picture in which he will make his Universal debut, "Universal Ike Gets a Goat," to be released on February 11th, is said to be even better.

Singular, isn't it, how an eye accustomed to the realism of the screen will detect heretofore unsuspected incongruities in high-class stage productions? When in a recent performance of "Othello" at the Manhattan Opera House, in the first scene of Act II, Montano says "Methinks the wind hath spoke aloud at land—a fuller blast ne'er shook our battlements," his lines were accompanied by the whistling of a most competent wind machine. In the stage settings of "an open place near the quay" were a number of trees. In spite of the gale indicated by the machine and referred to by Montano, not a leaf stirred!

Bennie Schulberg, of the Famous Players, received a telegram early this week from his old friend Joe Roach, scenario editor of the Essanay Company. The message invited congratulations and announced the writer's marriage to Ruth Stonehouse, of the Essanay Company, a player whose popularity is steadily increasing, and deservedly so, as she is doing conscientious, artistic work. Roach is entitled to congratulations, for by all report he has won a prize—a Lady Bountiful who in good works has been limited only by her means, and in manner charming, in disposition sweet. May every good fortune attend them!

Municipal authorities in several cities are taking steps to prevent overcrowding in picture theaters. Philadelphia, Harrisburg and Oil City, Penn.; Chicago and Atlanta officials have declared their intentions to keep clear of the danger point in the handling of crowds.

The Rev. C. E. Mead, pastor of the Methodist Church in Pine Island, Minn., has with the coöperation of his parishioners established such a good picture show that it is said men who have desired to open picture houses have been deterred through fear of being unable to match his standard. Mr. Mead's success demonstrates that even in small towns good subjects are available.

Raymond B. Fosdick, who as Commissioner of Accounts under the late Mayor Gaynor made a searching investigation of the picture theaters in New York City, in a recent address came out strongly against paid censorship boards, or, in other words, official bodies. In his remarks he reflected the views of his former chief. He said: "The temperatment of the American people is such that they will not stand for the dictation of a paid censor such as exists in London, where the system is a farce and a failure. Suppose some censor put a ban on the tango what an outcry there would be. But a voluntary board of censorship of moving pictures is both feasible and practicable, and if it were made up of men and women representative of the best interests of the community its decisions would be accepted without question and would be effective."

"Quo Vadis" at the Regent

Auspicious Presentation of Classic Production. Large Audiences Appreciate Artistic Treatment of George Kleine Importation.

The artistic manner in which S. L. Rothapfel presented the Cines version of "Quo Vadis?" at the Regent Theater, 116th Street and Seventh Avenue, New York City, of which house he is the manager, marks an advance in picture exhibition. The picture was run for a full week beginning Monday, January 26, to Saturday, January 31.

The skillful handling of a big eight-part feature picture goes a long way towards increasing the receipts. This is not saying that the big picture will not draw the crowds if it is not skillfully handled, but if the energy of the manager of a picture house would be expended in enhancing the way any picture is put on, greater success would seem assured. That is precisely what Mr. Rothapfel does. He makes a careful study of the pictures before he presents them and stipulates what effects and music should accompany them.

The music harmonized with the picture, and the effects, wherever used, synchronized perfectly. The production lent itself readily to the use of accessories and selections from "Faust," "Tannhauser," "La Tosca," "Parsifal," etc. This picture is more of a spectacular nature than of a dramatic one, and therefore is more open to embellishments.

The most impressive feature of the entertainment was the awe-inspiring prelude rendered by the capable orchestra under the direction of Carl Edouarde. Delicately interwoven were selections from noted composers, symbolic of parts of the picture, such as the march of the gladiators, the chariot race, the burning of Rome, etc. This score of the orchestral rendition, as well as the rest of the beautiful accompaniment, held one spellbound. To those who knew the book, the prelude brought visions of the story. The music alone was well worth the admission price. It is difficult to estimate the value of such appropriate accompaniment and to appreciate the great amount of time and energy expended in the artistic presentation of this moving picture.

That part of the picture showing Rome in flames was handled most imposingly. The orchestra did splendid work, and the shouts and shrieks from voices behind the screen added realism to the picture. An equally forcible manipulation of another part of the picture was the skillful working up of the crowded arena, showing the chariot races, gladiators engaged in mortal combat, the driving of the Christian martyrs into the arena to be fed to the infuriated lions and the throwing by the giant, Ursus, of the bull which carried Lygia on its back. The flaring of the orchestra, the sounds of the frenzied assemblage and the burning of incense which pervaded the atmosphere of the auditorium at all times, made one feel as though he were back in the year in which the action of the play is laid—66 to 68 A. D.

To open the de luxe entertainments, of which there were two a day, one at 3:15 and the other at 8:15, Mr. Rothapfel had a competent dramatic speaker, William Calhoun, enter a box on the left side of the auditorium, and, with the answering of a question, as to the meaning of "Quo Vadis?", from a young man sitting in the same box the speaker started to give a succinct little talk on how the author of the book, Henry Sienkiewicz, obtained his idea for the story. After Mr. Calhoun had given a brief story of the film the heavy asbestos curtain was raised to singing and displayed the orchestra garlanded in flowers. The singers' romantic recesses on each side of the stage were also festooned in greenery.

Three resounding blasts from trumpets accompanied by the rest of the orchestra started the entertainment proper on its way.

The picture was run in three sections, and at the beginning of each section, Mr. Calhoun lectured on what that part revealed. This helped to give a better understanding of the picture.

The production had been well advertised for some time by announcement slides, neatly framed billboards outside the theater and in the lobby and by handbills. The crowds came out in force.

Mr. Rothapfel has had great success with previous big features, such as "The Last Days of Pompeii," "Checkers," and many others. The artistic way in which these pictures were exhibited demonstrates what can be done by a skillful man with other pictures of a similar nature. The public, becoming appreciative of the entertainments, responds in greater numbers at future shows.

There are four exhibitions daily, two with the pipe organ at one and five p.m., and the two de luxe exhibitions previously stated. The admission prices were 25 and 50 cents.

New York Operators' Ball

By F. H. Richardson.

Saturday evening, January 24th, was red letter evening for New York operators, for on that date they succeeded in pulling off an affair which I am indeed glad to say was a distinct credit not only to Moving Picture Operators' Local Union No. 306, I. A. T. S. E., but also to each and every member of that organization. The occasion was the Grand Annual Ball given by the New York Operators' Union.

It was a beastly night. From an ink black sky came a heavy drizzle of rain which a shifting wind blew in gusts and eddies. The Manhattan Casino, where the ball was held, is far up town and taking the terrible weather conditions and the location of the hall into consideration I felt decidedly gloomy for I thought the affair would be a total failure.

But the popularity of the moving picture operators was thoroughly demonstrated by the fact that regardless of these things the great Manhattan Casino, among the largest dancing halls in New York, was comfortably filled, and by the time the grand march was started, dancing, even on that huge floor, was a rather uncomfortable process by reason of the crowded condition.

And now I want to say that I am proud of Local 306. The management of this affair would have reflected distinct credit on any organization in this city bar none. It was one of the most enjoyable affairs I have attended in New York and I have been to a great many balls, moving picture and otherwise, in the past four years. There has been an enormous improvement in the men in that time. The evidence that the operators are beginning to appreciate and understand the responsibility of their position was reflected by their general demeanor. I noticed men who, by their behavior at similar affairs four years ago, advertised themselves as of the rough-neck element, where that night, both in appearance and behavior, all were perfect gentlemen. All this is set forth as proof of the fact that the profession is rapidly advancing and seeking a higher level, a condition the writer has sought by every means in his power to bring about.

The guests of honor for the evening were: Lee M. Hart, general secretary-treasurer, I. A. T. S. E. and wife, and John Bunny, both of whom received an ovation. Misses Ida Brenner and Elizabeth Shocke, both of the I. A. T. S. E. general offices were present. The Moving Picture World was represented by the writer, who was kept busy all the evening shaking hands and dodging invitations to liquid refreshments. The Nicholas Power Company was represented by its general manager, J. F. Skerrett; W. C. Smith, assistant general manager; L. W. Atwater, sales manager; William Barry, advertising manager; H. J. McKinnon, inspector; E. E. De Hart, James Saullo, Frank Saullo, and Mr. and Mrs. Hall. The Simplex Company was represented by Howard Coles, its general manager, and Mr. Bothwell. The grand march was led by Lee M. Hart and Mrs. Hart, followed by John Bunny and partner. In addition to Mr. Bunny, the Vitagraph was represented by James Stanafield and Mr. Bunny's younger son, Frank. E. M. Saunders, M. H. Hoffman, and E. H. Goldstein were present from the Universal. Brother J. S. Stevens and wife, Harold Williams and other members of Local 35 were there. In fact there was a liberal sprinkling of notables in the film world, the names of all of whom I was not able to secure.

By the way, general secretary-treasurer, Lee M. Hart, has another title. He may now be hailed as general secretary-treasurer of the I. A. T. S. E. and grand keeper of the powder puff. This latter title he will explain to inquiring friends, but from what I saw it is by no means an empty one. Miss Brenner could doubtless give information and doubtless Mrs. Hart also could but would not.

John Bunny has been made an honorary member of the Boston Local and carries a card which is unique. It is of ordinary working card size, and is of solid gold with the I. A. T. S. E. emblem in enamel in one corner; a very beautiful piece of work of which brother Bunny is inordinately proud.

Joseph D. Bassom, president of Local Union 306, and L. C. Van Orsdale, vice-president, were busier than two bees in honey time, while Gus Durkin, recording secretary, flew around like a hen taking care of sixteen chickens. Manager of the floor, Tom Costello, covered himself with glory, while Jack Winnick—well there is only one Jack and he is inimitable. Several people sized him up and then asked whether he was the husband of Mrs. Stuyvesant Fish or not—some class to Jack all right.

The ball lasted until the wee small hours and not a single incident occurred in any way to mar the proceedings. Wherefore we may conclude by saying that Local 306 has covered herself with glory laid on several coats thick.

FOURTH ANNUAL CONVENTION OF OHIO.

State Branch No. 1 of the M. P. E. L. of America, at Cincinnati.

By James S. McQuade.

THE Fourth Annual Convention of Ohio State Branch No. 1 was opened in the fine assembly hall of the Sinton Hotel, Cincinnati, Tuesday afternoon, January 27, at three o'clock. The Rev. Dr. Watson, who was introduced by President M. A. Neff, invoked the Divine Blessing on the deliberations of the assembly.

The Hon. Frederick S. Spiegel, Mayor of Cincinnati, was then called upon to deliver his speech of welcome. In the course of his appropriate and timely remarks, he pointed out that the future probabilities of moving pictures were almost infinite. "In Cincinnati the class of pictures exhibited make the moving picture theaters a Mecca for both old and young, and the theaters are all well patronized," he said. "People have the right to expect the best in moving pictures, and it is the duty of theater managers to give the very best to their patrons."

In the opinion of the mayor, citizens of Cincinnati are very liberal to high class amusements, and picture theaters can offer more pleasurable entertainment, in this respect, than any other form of amusement in the land. Pictures of the right kind give a greater incentive to literary and other pursuits that make for the uplift of the people. He reminded his hearers that Cincinnati was a center of high intellectual culture, and he assured them that they had it in their power, in a marked degree, to contribute still further to its development.

Before closing his remarks, and after looking critically over the fine audience, he said: "From the intelligence of the faces before me, I realize that there is no need for a censorship."

After an adjournment of ten minutes the convention met in executive session, to which the press was admitted.

J. H. Broomhall, state secretary, and W. R. Wilson, state treasurer, were called to the platform by President Neff, after which his report for the year was given in a forceful, but brief, speech. He drew attention to the numerous charges made against exhibitors that they are not business men, and that their organization had not been handled in a business manner. He, therefore, enjoined members to get together during the convention and accomplish things that will prove the falseness of the charges.

He reviewed the work done by the organization during the past year, and pointedly centered attention on the smallness of the dues paid by each member to the state organization. Only one dollar a year, or less than ten cents per month! Yet, notwithstanding the smallness of the funds in the state treasury, much had been accomplished by men who had devoted their time and energy to the work without a single cent of pay.

Hundreds, and, in some instances, over a thousand miles had been travelled to perform that work, and he called upon the Ways and Means Committee, which he was just about to appoint, to devise and frame the program necessary to carry on the work efficiently and in a thorough business manner. He then appointed on the Ways and Means Committee the following members:

F. E. Simmons, Cleveland; Jno. H. Broomhall, Hamilton; Dr. W. V. Prentiss, Toledo; Jno. Swain, Columbus; Warner W. Miller, Mt. Vernon; Geo. D. Spragg, Bellaire; O. B. Weaver, Dayton; Garland Hill, Lebanon; Jno. J. Huss, Cincinnati, and W. B. Gandy, Lima.

The Auditing Committee was then named as follows: Edward Kohl, Cleveland; Chas. Sternberger, Cincinnati, and B. S. Leeds, Middletown.

The Grievance Committee was next selected as follows: H. O. Alexander, Dayton; W. H. Horsey, Cleveland; Otto Luedeking, Cincinnati; W. R. Wilson, Columbus, and N. E. Chaney, Hillsboro.

The Committee on Constitution and By-Laws was comprised of the following members: F. P. Reichert, Port Clinton (member of the Sandusky local); O. J. Sybert, Marietta; F. L. Emmert, Cincinnati; J. M. Kaufman, Gallipolis, and M. E. Wagner, Lockland.

The convention then adjourned until 10 o'clock Wednesday morning.

Wednesday's Work.

On convening Wednesday morning, President Neff read a number of telegrams from various state officers and others throughout the country conveying expressions of good will and Godspeed to those assembled; after which the arrival of Ex- U. S. Senator J. B. Foraker was announced. The venerable statesman was given an ovation as he walked through the hall to the platform where he was introduced by President Neff in an eloquent tribute to his national and state services, and as chief counsel of the league. The senator congratulated those present as the representatives of a business that is prosperous, popular, educational and civilizing. To demonstrate its beneficent influence on uncivilized and half civilized people of the earth, he read extracts from an able article in a recent issue of the Sunset Magazine which described its effects on the natives of Tahiti and other Polynesian islands, there being no less than nine picture theaters in Tahiti.

After Senator Foraker's departure Tom J. Kern, state building inspector, delivered an address in which he showed that his department was willing to modify existing laws where they might be too rigid and stringent on picture theaters, and he assured exhibitors that his department desired to be fair and reasonable towards all.

The question of the number of reels constituting a program was brought up and referred to a committee for report. Mr. Spraggs, on the Ways and Means Committee, reported that no action had been taken, but recommended that arrangements be made with some national advertising concern for the running of an advertising slide for one dollar per week on the screens in theaters owned by members throughout Ohio. Mr. Neff, however, appointed a new committee of three to consider ways and means to get sufficient money in the state treasury so as to conduct the league's business efficiently.

During the afternoon session this committee recommended that one advertising slide each week should be run as formerly proposed and that all members running the slides should have their dues remitted. The question was discussed generally by members after which it was decided to reject the motion founded on the committee's recommendation.

Immediately afterwards State Secretary Broomwell moved that the membership yearly dues be raised from six to twelve dollars per year, allowing the state treasury one dollar instead of fifty cents per month. Max Stern, of Columbus, seconded the motion in a strong speech and after further discussion, it was put to a vote and carried unanimously.

To return to the morning session. The Committee on Grievances reported that none were brought forward. A motion was next made to amend the state constitution so that the state treasurer's duties should be increased by making him also discharge the duties of financial and corresponding secretary, at an increased salary of one hundred and fifty dollars per year. It was carried.

A resolution was proposed by E. J. Bauman, Cincinnati, that the exhibitors of Ohio agree that a motor shall be used in picture theaters in the state was passed, with instructions that state building inspectator Kern be notified of the action.

Afternoon Session.

The afternoon session was opened at two o'clock. The committee appointed at the morning session to consider the number of reels to be run on five and ten cent programs, reported that the decision would not be ready until Thursday morning.

The Sunday opening question in Ohio and the formulation of a bill to be brought before the legislature was referred to the State Executive Committee.

The poster question followed, and its discussion was interrupted until later by the reading of the report of the auditing committee. This showed everything in first class shape with $2831 received and $2715 paid out.

A motion by Fred Bott, amended by Lem Miller, that the nomination of delegates to the next National Convention be first considered by an appointed committee with instructions to report Thursday morning was carried. The poster discussion was resumed at this point and the elimination of the poster at the earliest possible time was considered.

After prolonged debate, during which it was moved that the organization go on record to ask film manufacturers and exchanges to furnish posters free to members of the Ohio organization, as in western parts of the country, it was moved by Emmert, of Cincinnati, that a committee be appointed to get in touch with film manufacturers on the matter, time being required to bring the issue to a head. Max Stern, Columbus; F. L. Emmert, Cincinnati, and Ed Kohl, Cleveland, are on the committee.

President Neff then appointed the following as members of the recommendation committee on delegates:

A. C. Dingelstead, Cincinnati; W. B. Gandy, Lima; H. E. Vestal, Ada; J. H. Broomhall, Hamilton; G. W. Heinbuch, Cleveland, and W. D. Belknap, Columbus.

Wednesday evening an imposing banquet was held with hundreds of people at the board, and Gov. Cox and other prominent speakers in attendance. Quite a number of visitors and their wives were guests of the Chamber of Commerce at the Zoological Gardens, in the afternoon.

As we go to press a telegraphic dispatch advises the election of the following officers for the Ohio State League: President, M. A. Neff; first vice-president, G. M. Kaufman; second vice-president, G. D. Spragg; secretary, J. H. Broomhall; treasurer, W. R. Wilson; national vice-president, Ed Kohl.

NATIONAL EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE MEETING.

Several Important Questions Discussed at the Cincinnati Meeting. Peter Jeup, of Detroit, Succeeds Blumenthal.

THE Executive Committee of the National League met in Cincinnati at 10 o'clock, Tuesday morning, January 27th. There were present: M. A. Neff, Geo. H. Wiley, M. E. Cory (San Francisco), and Peter J. Jeup, of Detroit, the latter being appointed to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of L. F. Blumenthal, of New Jersey.

The other members of the committee—R. L. Macnabb, of New York, and T. P. Finnegan, of Texas—were unable to be present on account of important business engagements. The following report was submitted by President Neff:

Report of President Neff.

Immediately after the New York Convention I secured the services of Lem S. Miller, of Cincinnati, and Tobias A. Kepper, of New York, as attorneys to protect our interest in collecting the amount due the National League.

Miller and Kepper asked for 50%. After a consultation, they decided to accept 40% and take the chance of collecting. There were many legal phrases that came up and a large number of interests to satisfy. After a great deal of time being spent, it seemed that the New York local would settle, but they wanted to settle on their own basis, which I refused, and I instructed our attorneys accordingly.

I re-organized New York as quickly as possible, held a convention at Syracuse at the same time the bolters' delegates held a convention at the same hotel; they followed us everywhere we went. It was then decided to hold a convention in 60 days at Rochester, which we did. In the meantime the New York bolters asked for a settlement on the basis that they pay the National League, which I refused, and demanded that they pay the State of New York $600.00, as the New York organization was the regular organization. They had been promised previously 25%, but settled for $600.00. Eventually, the attorneys secured a settlement and our National League received $1,290.00. The State of New York received $600.00.

The State of New York has been re-organized, has money in the treasury, and is now making good progress, owing to conditions in New York and the inactivity of the local officers in New York City.

The president of the New York State League, Mr. Wolff, reports that he has four organizers now in the field and will soon be able to make a favorable report.

I recommend that some action be taken to secure members in New York City, as it seems that there is practically nothing being done.

I visited the State of Maine, and found everything in fine shape. At a meeting, held in the State, all of the members were enthusiastic and are loyally supporting the League.

The State of Massachusetts, especially Boston, seems to be in a bad condition and almost impossible to arouse them.

The State of Pennsylvania is making some progress lately. I have met the president, Mr. Jeffries, of Philadelphia, and have laid out plans and hope to organize Pennsylvania on a firm, substantial basis.

Illinois has been re-organized with 100 members. A large number of them paid their dues a year in advance and paid their per capita tax at the time of organization. They were organized at a convention held at Peoria, and the convention was a grand success.

Illinois Local No. 1, the only local in the State, repudiated the action of the Chicago bolters. Illinois is standing solid and loyal by the organization.

The State of Indiana is re-organized by the election of a president, secretary, treasurer, and national vice-president. Everything looks hopeful in Indiana for an early adjustment of all matters pertaining to the League.

I advise that Indiana be left alone for a short time.

Wisconsin has been re-organized with a membership of 74. In Milwaukee we only have two members, but I confidentially predict that within the next three or four months two-thirds of the exhibitors of Milwaukee will be members of the League.

I visited Minnesota with a great expense to the League, with the hope that Minnesota would remain loyal. I was informed by the president, Mr. Rath, that so long as Minnesota had five members they would remain loyal to the League or they would turn over all supplies, money, charter and seal to the National secretary. The National secretary can report as to what they have done.

There has not been a state that bolted that has turned in its supplies, money, charter or seal. It is up to the committee to take action in this matter, as we have legal rights.

I recommend a strong, vigorous campaign and when a state officer does not consider his office of importance enough to properly assume the duties of his office be given a stipulated length of time to act or resign.

The League has grown to the extent that we cannot afford to have exhibitors of a state represented by officers who will not give their office consideration. I, therefore, recommend that some action be taken along these lines.

It has been a strenuous, hard battle to hold the bolting states in line and re-organize them, but it affords me great pleasure to report that all the bolting states, with the exception of Minnesota, have been re-organized and are on a more firmed and business foundation than ever before, and the only reason Minnesota has not been organized is because the former president made a statement today that there would be nothing done unless he so notified the National officers. We will, however, organize Minnesota in the near future.

The amount of money collected by myself for the National League is $1,290.00 from New York, $1,000.00 from the National Cash Register Co., of Dayton, O., $50.00 from the State of Illinois, and $36.50 from the State of Wisconsin.

The question has been raised and asked: "What has the National League accomplished for the states?" First—I would call your attention to three National conventions, which have compelled the attention of the entire world, has brought the exhibitors, manufacturers, and others together and they have become acquainted, and there is a sentiment now crystalized that will harmonize and eventually bring about, through co-operation, interest in our line of business.

This within itself should appeal to every thinking exhibitor. It does not only give the exhibitor, the manufacturer, the film exchange, and the supply man an opportunity to become acquainted, but it affords an opportunity to our press to gather information and in plain words "size up the situation and view the various individuals and conditions as they really are."

The National Organization has permanently brought before the world the Motion Picture Industry and its principle has appealed to the people; has stimulated trade by increasing the attendance; has shown to the fanatic and knocker that we are capable business men and worthy of patronage and full consideration; has demonstrated our power to successfully meet and overcome adverse conditions.

The National League, through its efforts, secured for every exhibitor in the United States high-class feature films, free of charge. In other words, the National League was the means of securing the features made by the regular manufacturers—free—as they were purchased in the regular service and no extra charges made for same. Whether the exhibitors have appreciated the thousands and thousands of dollars they have saved, we leave to them.

Every exhibitor was paying from $5 to $75 for features that the National League secured for them free.

The question has arisen with the manufacturers whether their efforts were appreciated and, in fact, it seems to a large number of exhibitors that many of their brothers failed to appreciate the features furnished free, and it also appears that we have many exhibitors that cannot understand that they themselves have the right and privilege to feature their own films and that the only way a feature film can be distinguished from other films is when someone charges extra for them—that seems to establish the fact that it is a feature.

The National League also made it possible for every exhibitor in the United States to buy his supplies at wholesale prices, saving him 40% on his purchases. This, in itself, if the exhibitor would take advantage of it, would save him hundreds of thousands of dollars.

The National League has conducted its business along lines that have established a credit, which many older organizations would be proud of, and while we have had strife within and strife without in our League, we have marched on, securing new members, gathering strength and prestige until, today, we are recognized as an organization of men worthy of the consideration of the Chambers of Commerce and the financial and commercial world, and also looked upon by the churches and educational authorities as engaged in a business that is clean and worthy.

The resignation of J. J. Reider, national treasurer, of Jackson, Mich., was read and accepted, and the records of the treasurer were received and turned over to the auditing committee, comprised of Secretary Wiley, Mr. Corey and Mr. Jeup.

Secretary Wiley made an oral report to the effect that since receiving the books from the former secretary, Mr. Christenson, he had made a careful examination of the same and brought all the records of the office up to date. He also stated that he had conducted a vigorous campaign among the state officers throughout the country, and, as a result of his experience, he wished to recommend that hereafter special care be taken by all state branches to select men for office who would give a part of their time to the work, and that they should at least be qualified to answer letters. He said that new charters had been issued for New York, Illinois, Indiana and Wisconsin; that Minnesota had promised to return its charter and all property of the League, but that this had not yet been done.

Secretary Wiley also reported that a new branch had been organized in Oregon, which will be known as Branch No. 41.

He concluded with the statement that all per capita tax had been collected from the various state branches, in an amount sufficent to meet all obligations, and that the finances of the League are in excellent condition.

The Executive Committee adopted a resolution recommending to the officials of the New York State branch that they ask for the resignation of Sidney Ascher, as national vice-president.

At the meeting held Wednesday afternoon the National Executive Committee elected Orene Parker, of Covington, Ky., treasurer of the National League to fill the unexpired term of J. J. Rieder, resigned.

Resolutions condemning the action of the Golden Gate Film Exchange of San Francisco and advising members of the league to withhold patronage from any film exchange owning and operating theaters upon an unfair basis, discouraging the production of subjects of more than five reels; urging manufacturers and exchanges to refuse to permit their program to be shown in theaters using junk films, and urging manufacturers to produce less multiple reel subjects.

Concerning the question of censorship, the Executive Committee adopted this resolution:

"RESOLVED, That it is the sense of this committee, by reason of the censor question now being in the hands of the Federal Court, and that a decision is pending as to the legality of a censor board, that this committee recommends that no further action be taken at this time in regard to the matter, and further recommends that league members in all states and municipalities refrain from all agitation and action pertaining to the censor question until after the National Convention, to be held at Dayton, Ohio, during the week of July 7, 1914."

A resolution was adopted authorizing the national president to obtain from the members of the league their sentiment upon the question of publishing a league newspaper and the possibilities of financing the same.

Regarding the arrangements for the National Convention at Dayton, a special committee was appointed, consisting of Secretary Wiley, Treasurer Parker, Committeeman Jeup and M. A. Neff, ex-officio, to take charge of all arrangements, Secretary Wiley to make his headquarters in Dayton during the two months preceding the convention.

The committee then went into executive session to consider the finances of the league. JAMES S. McQUADE.

MISSOURI STATE MEETING.

George H. Wiley, National Secretary, Resigns as National Vice-President for Missouri. E. E. Richards, of Kansas City, Elected to Succeed Him.

WITH brass tack talks featuring the occasion, the semi-annual meeting of the Missouri branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America was held at the Sexton Hotel, Kansas City, on January 21. Given the watchword, "A get-together meeting," the members of the Missouri branch of the national organization got together in reality and settled a good many points which have been vexatious for sometime past. Close to a hundred members were on hand when George H. Wiley, national secretary, called the meeting to order in the absence of President Louis Hermann, of St. Louis, who was unable to attend because of a death in his family.

The morning session of the Missouri branch was called to order at 10:30 a. m., and gave the exhibitors and supply men an opportunity to get acquainted.

All of the visiting exhibitors were guests of Kansas City Local No. 1 of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America at luncheon at the famous Pennant Cafe. Music was rendered by Rigo's Hungarian orchestra, and the mid-day meal provided a thoroughly enjoyable feature of the semi-annual meeting.

The first of the afternoon sessions was a private one for exhibitors only, film and other supply men being invited to enjoy quiet cigars on the exterior of the convention hall. National Secretary George H. Wiley presided at the meeting and announced his resignation as national vice-president for Missouri. Mr. Wiley stated that he will shortly make his headquarters in New York, the logical place for them, and had practically closed a deal for his Kansas City house. While Mr. Wiley's resignation was regretfully accepted, the members wished him good fortune in his new field, and tendered him a rising vote of thanks for the missionary work he has done in Missouri. E. E. Richards, of Kansas City, was elected to the place left vacant by Mr. Wiley's resignation.

The secretary of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of America, incidentally, talked frankly to the members regarding the lack of interest in the organization shown by Missouri exhibitors. He stated that only good fortune had prevented the expulsion of the state association, and urged the members to rally round the national league and demonstrate that Missouri is as progressive as other states which have taken the lead in organization work.

The doors were then thrown open to the supply men and a free-for-all discussion, which at times became rather heated, was launched. The first question taken up was that of poster service and express charges. Some of the film exchanges, it was stated, provide posters free of charge, though the majority recently changed their policy in this regard. Most of the exchanges also require exhibitors to pay express both ways. The moving picture men asked why this should be.

C. S. Edwards, manager of the Kansas City branch of the General Film Company, explained the situation to the satisfaction of all concerned and convinced the majority of the exhibitors that the latter should both pay for the posters as well as for the expressage both ways.

Mr. Edwards reviewed the moving picture business, going back to the days before posters were generally utilized. "At that time," he stated, "exhibitors began to feel the need of some sort of displays in connection with their pictures, and offered to pay any reasonable price for them." The General Film Co., according to Mr. Edwards, now charges five cents for each poster, and allows exhibitors to take as many or as few as they please. He explained that the business has been put on a commercial basis, that exchanges do not get the posters free of charge themselves and could hardly be expected to include poster service with the films. "Should this be done," he added, "it was highly probable that the exchanges would merely raise the price of their film service, thus making up for the loss of revenue on posters." Mr. Edwards concluded that exhibitors could not expect something for nothing any more than could other business men. Most of the following speakers took Mr. Edwards' view of the matter and exhibitors in Missouri probably will continue to pay for their posters for some time to come. The film man also explained that the prices f. o. b. Kansas City, were such as to allow exchanges to make only a nominal margin, which would be wiped out by express charges, which naturally fell on the shoulders of the purchaser.

Julius Singer, an exchange man who recently has had trouble with the censors in Kansas City over one of his presentations, started a warm discussion when he stated that exhibitors did not care for high-class productions, and allowed them to warm the shelves at exchanges while they purchased the sensational stuff freely. William Welch, secretary of Kansas City Local No. 1, defended the taste of exhibitors, asserting that the vast majority were after high grade films. Other speakers came to his rescue and reiterated that sentiment. "The day of sensationalism and wild west pictures is about over," stated Mr. Welch. "The public doesn't care for them as much as it once did. Also, gone is the day when a man can kick in the front of a store and call himself an exhibitor and I, for one, am glad of it." Other speakers asserted that exhibitors are after the best pictures in the market and that Mr. Singer had the wrong idea altogether. The latter, however, added a touch of humor to the situation by telling the exhibitors that he was not offended by their frankness and only asked them to "practice what you preach."

Short addresses were made on various subjects. G. H. Parker, representing the Rudolph Wurlitzer Company, in Kansas City, spoke on "Music and the Picture," urging exhibitors to devote more attention to appropriate music for their picture entertainments. C. S. Edwards, of the General Film Company, stated that the day was coming when moving pictures would be handled by circuits such as now book legitimate productions. Apropos of sensational pictures, he told a story of a crusader in Kansas City who arose at a meeting and declared that he had solved the vice problem, tracing its source to the motion picture. The gentleman, when queried as to the name of the picture or pictures, asserted proudly that he had never seen a moving picture, and hoped never to see one.

Social features of the meeting were numerous and worth while. The feature film exchange men entertained the visitors at the Empress theater in the evening. J. W. Cotter, World's Special Film Corporation; Julius Singer, World's Leader; S. J. Bermen, Warner's Features, and William Siever, of the Famous Players, were the hosts of the occasion. Following the theater the exhibitors enjoyed a dutch lunch at the Sexton Hotel, provided by C. S. Edwards and Royale V. Rothermel, of the General Film Company; Joseph Spero, Universal Film Company, and Paul A. Engler, Mutual Film Corporation. M. E. C.

MARCUSSON ARRESTED.

Samuel Marcusson, known to the trade as an exchange man and owner of the Improved Feature Film Company of America, located at 42 East Fourteenth Street, New York, was arrested on Wednesday, January 21, together with Morris Daniels a clerk in his employ, upon charges made by Harry Buxbaum, manager of the Fourth Avenue Branch of the General Film Company. It is stated that films to the value of $100,000 had been removed from the General Film Company's branch through the connivance of Martin Gilbert, an office boy; George Brown, a messenger, and Alexander Lehrie, employed at the General Film Company's Twenty-third Street branch.

Lehrie was arrested Saturday, January 17, and is said to have made a full confession.

We understand that there has been a general denial entered by Marcusson who claims that the reels in question were all purchased in Europe.

"The Mystery of St. Martin's Bridge."

Fidelity Film Company Releases a Five Part Subject Containing Many Beautiful Settings.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

THE Fidelity Film Company is showing a five-part picture notable for its many charming backgrounds, elaborate staging, and fine photography. Undoubtedly much money has been expended in its production. The maker is the Aquila Company, of Turin. The producer has enhanced the value of his work by judicious tinting and toning. He has weakened his production by subordinating the dramatic to the spectacular. The story is unpleasant in the first place. Lord Martagne is a villain without one redeeming feature, a libertine who at no time makes a single appeal to the sympathy—a wise author would have known better than to attempt this. In the first reel we are not shown how the rural lover of the mountain girl discovered the identity of the disguised Martagne or where Cora obtained the costume to wear to the fancy dress ball, or, for that matter, how she obtained entrance to the social function. It was a mistake to select for the maid of Irma a woman so closely resembling Cora—many will think the first victim of Martagne in the employ of the second. The condemnation of Irma and of Albert, the man who loved her, for murder was on palpably insufficient evidence—the unsupported word of a maid. The magnifying of the block and the great axe of the headsman as well as the platform on which the public execution was to take place constituted a gruesome spectacle which, while essentially Continental, can appeal only to the morbid.

The opening scenes in "The Mystery of St. Martin's Bridge" are of Cora, dancing girl of a mountain tribe, entertaining her people in a cave. It is a pretty picture. Later we see her in disguise at the fancy dress ball given by Lord Martagne, the man who had discarded her and to whose home she had gone to slay him. The dance is well staged. When Martagne receives a message bidding him depart immediately on a diplomatic mission he puts his costume on one of his servants. It is this person who narrowly escapes the knife of the woman and it is he who is later kidnapped, bound to a stake and under threat of having his sight destroyed by heated irons, reveals the supposed destination of his employer. Later we see Cora, now in apparent affluence, attending a well-put-on stage performance; she here discovers Martagne, accompanied by two women.

The diplomat has in the meantime been winning the love of the daughter of his host, Irma, who had been pledged to Arthur. Martagne declares his regard for the girl in a clandestine and unarranged visit to her apartments late at night. When the diplomat gets word of the failure of a business venture he writes a note demanding that she bring to him at the bridge at midnight $25,000, under penalty of exposure to Albert. The revenge-pursuing mountain girl breaks into the house, finds the note Martagne has left for Irma, and goes to keep the appointment on her own account. She forces the diplomat to fight a duel with her. She shoots him, his body falls into the water, and by the current is thrown upon the shore, where Irma sees it, as she comes to the bridge with the money. The overwrought girl is seized with the delusion that she has committed the murder. The next day she informs Albert that she is the slayer of Martagne. He induces her to flee with him. A maid who has overheard the tale of Irma notifies the police and the two are arrested, tried and condemned to the block.

A few months later Cora, now a professional dancer, appears at an elaborate function and with her assistants gives a performance. She learns of the conviction of the two. Unnerved, she is burned in a fire dance. When in bed she hears that the execution is about to take place she insists on being taken to the scene. She tells her story, saves the two lovers and dies of exhaustion.

"WHITE SLAVE" CASE FOR JURY TRIAL.

Samuel H. London and nine other men will be tried in the Court of General Sessions, New York, within a short time for producing in the Park Theater the film entitled "Inside of the White Slave Traffic," which a city magistrate decided was an obscene play. Just as soon as the magistrate announced his decision John B. Stanchfield, for the defendants, applied to Justice Vernon M. Davis in the Criminal Branch of the Supreme Court for a jury trial. In the ordinary course of matters these cases would have been disposed of by three justices of Special Sessions, a court having jurisdiction over misdemeanor charges; but Mr. Stanchfield felt that in order to better protect his clients a jury of twelve men should pass upon the films. He offered to hire a theater and show the films. Justice Davis decided to have the matter submitted to a grand pury for possible indictments, and in that way get the case before a petit jury. The arguments used by the promoters of the obnoxious films were all submitted to Justice Gavegan in the Supreme Court, who wrote a scathing opinion on the films, condemning them as being unfit for public exhibition. The Corporation Counsel only had to tell of one scene in the film depicting the interior of a disorderly house when Justice Gavegan gave his decision "off the reel."

PATENTS CO. TEXAS SUIT COMPROMISED.

Dallas, Texas, January 15—The suit against the Motion Picture Patents Company, brought by the State of Texas for alleged violation of Texas anti-trust laws, has been compromised by the payment of a fine of $25,000 by the defendant motion picture companies involved, according to a decision suggested by state's attorneys and defendant's attorneys and handed down by Judge W. H. Davidson in the Fifty-eighth District Court, at Beaumont, Texas, Tuesday. The fine of $25,000 was paid yesterday. The following defendants in the suit were dismissed and were ordered "to go hence without day": Motion Picture Patents Company, Biograph Company, Thomas A. Edison, Essanay, Kalem, George Kleine, Lubin, Pathe Freres, Selig Polyscope, Vitagraph, and Armat Moving Picture Company.

The suit involved a charge of violating anti-trust laws in the purchase of the assets and physical property of the J. D. Wheelan Film Corporation, of Dallas. J. P. Lightfoot, attorney for the General Film Company, said that his clients did not admit that they had violated the law in this matter but that they would enter a plea of guilty in order to get rid of the receivership. H. A. Wroe, of Austin, Texas, receiver, has one week in which to file his final report.

According to the decision there is to be no discrimination hereafter in the leasing of films or of film projecting machines or devices. The films of the Motion Picture Patents Company may hereafter be leased by all picture theaters whether they use independent films or not.

DON'T FORGET THE SCREEN CLUB BALL.

Saturday evening, January 31, is the date and the Grand Central Palace, Lexington Avenue and 46th Street, is the place when and where the justly famous Screen Club Ball will be held.

With very few exceptions, every able-bodied photoplayer and the female of the same species within a reasonable radius of New York will be there in propria persona (Latin). It will be a brilliant gathering of the trade and representative of every branch, particularly the higher. The great hall is in readiness; the 38—count 'em—38 musicians are chafing at the delay to get in and tear off the tantalizing Tangoes. The committee on decorations has completed its labor of love; it has transformed the Palace, as the cub reporter would say, "Into a veritable fairyland" and retires to don the spike-tail flushed but happy. The souvenir programs are stacked in neat piles; they will be dispensed by the fair hands of lady stars and will make valuable keepsakes.

The festivities will begin at 8 p.m. and will continue ad infinitum. The tickets are two dollars, admitting lady and gentleman. Extra lady one dollar. For sale at the Screen Club, 165 West 47th Street, and by all club members.

"Captured by Redskins"

A Belmont Three Reel Indian Feature.

Indian pictures exist chiefly for the animated action they make possible. It is the hard riding, the attack and battle, the capture and rescue that are expected in them. Yet the story is important too; but even where that is not strong, if the other items are present, the picture will be counted entertaining by many. Perhaps the best followers of such offerings are not carpingly critical. In this picture we have all the elements that have proved popular. There is sensational riding when the hero is chased and pulled off his galloping horse by a band of Reds. There is a cabin burning scene that is realistic and, in the final reel, a fine situation of melodramatic nature follows an escape of the hero from the Indian village with the help of a "pale faced squaw" who is really his sister. Just as the Indians are about to overtake them, the cowboys arrive and fight off the enemy not without casualties. One thing that helps a good deal in the impression made by this offering is the quality of the photography. Many of the backgrounds are forest scenes and they are well taken photographically. There are parts of this story that are not absolutely clear.

"Behind Comedy's Mask"

Asta Neilsen's Acting Gives Power to a Coming Pathe Two-Part Offering.

Reviewed by Hanford Judson.

THE story of this picture deals with theatrical people and gets its title from the tragedy of a woman playing a part in a comedy while her only child is at home dying. Asta Neilsen takes the role of the woman, and in the first act we find her, with her husband, at the close of a successful run of Joan of Arc. Another woman is now taken into the stock company and to her wiles the actor, the husband, succumbs. With this situation clearly but succinctly stated the action jumps a year. The wife has obtained a divorce and lives with her child. The husband is paying attentions to the other woman. A dramatic author is now directing the company, and he is paying court to the former wife, whose attentions she accepts in a prettily acted scene. Subtle contrasts and cross currents in emotion are now obtained by making her child fall sick; for the boy's increasing illness makes it necessary for her to go to her former husband and plead with him to pay him a visit. This could hardly have been an easy duty on this wife's part and Miss Neilsen has put the naturalness of truth into her picture of it with one emotion in it opening the door to another. The first request to come would have been cold as though one were asking only what were one's right. Refusal brings indignation and then a sense of failure brings pity for the sick child for whom she is pleading, which becomes tender and pathetic. Then, at this point, the author-director enters and, catching the conversation, makes a scene out of jealousy.

The boy grows weaker, yet the poor mother goes on with the play, in which she has the role of Pierrot. In her clown's queer dress she has not a whisper of direct help in her portrayal of her grief. Her dress and make-up are both against her; but, as Asta Neilsen makes the grief-stricken mother rush from the theater to the bedside and pray in her agony, it is like a cry from the depths of the spirit. But she is again persuaded to go back to the stage and carry out her part in the play and in the midst of it a sister of charity comes and she now knows definitely that all is over—the child is dead. The other players creep aside so as not to intrude on her grief, which in very truth is terrible. The impression rings true with no counter suggestions and is carried to us almost solely by facial expression. Here is passion without the rags. There is no clawing of the air; but a soul is being wound up on the wheel of pain before us.

The ending of the story comes with her death in the last act of the play. It is a duel act, in which the former husband and she fight with foils. She had determined to kill him; because he refused to come to see the dying child and has taken off both tips leaving the rapiers bare under the caps. In the fight, her husband stabs her through the lung; but goes on with the scene without a suspicion that the steel really did go into the flesh. So she dies. A very strongly acted picture. The photograph and every department of the staging are of remarkable quality.

"The Dock Disaster"

An Apex Three-Part Offering with a Most Sensational Climax.

Reviewed by Hanford Judson.

IT WILL seem almost incredible to the average spectator that a stage could be set and scene enacted in this picture when a dam breaks and a flood of waters is let loose upon a large company of people gathered to celebrate the completion of a great engineering work. Indeed, it is not absolutely clear just how it is done, but no one in the audience will miss the fact, as the waters rush in, that something terrible is transpiring. It is for this scene, or, rather, group of scenes, that the picture was made. The story has nothing especially noteworthy, although it furnishes a fine chance for acting to the player who takes the part of the engineer—the leading role. As a love story, it is far from convincing.

Scene from "The Dock Disaster" (Apex).

Some actual engineering project must have furnished the background to the producer, for he has utilized steam shovels at work, and other accessories. The hero, the man in charge of the work, and its villain, who is rather colorless, is his helper, being also an engineer. The latter had formerly been a lover of the hero's wife, before their marriage. His attentions cause the husband to become jealous. A fire occurs in the house and the husband rescues his wife. The villain dashes into the burning building to recover some plans of the engineering work, and, in coming out, is injured, preventing his being present at the opening-day ceremonies, when officials and the invited guests go down into the great basin, or dry dock, and make speeches there. It sounds as though it were a queer thing to do; but it did not appear unwarranted while we were looking at it. In the midst of the hero's speech, water is seen beginning to pour over the sides of the basin. A flash title tells us, "The dam has broken," and then some well-selected scenes, among them one showing the engineer being swept along in some mill race, give to the whole a sense of nightmare terror that is very effective, so unusual, in truth, that we, without hesitation, believe that on this incident alone the offering will be a decided success.

The engineer is saved; but goes mad from the shock of seeing his great work go down into ruin. We see him distraught, and rushing through a rough forest. Later he is put in an asylum, but recovers in time to save his wife from marrying the younger engineer, who is again making love to her. The photography is clear enough in all the scenes—but in few is the quality perfect. There is a touch of mist in sections, as though the emulsion were old or the bath too hot.

Manufacturers Advance Notes

"THE OTHER GIRL" (Essanay).

This is an excellent drama, the turning point of the story being a lost note which had failed to be delivered. Francis X. Bushman, in the leading role of Frank Dixon, injects realism into the part which carries the audience spell-bound throughout the entire projection. The photography of the piece is all that could be desired and the rest of the cast handle their characters well. The story runs smoothly and has an interesting atmosphere, which is bound to please patrons of the photoplay theaters. Mr. Bushman is putting forth his best efforts and this is a very good example of his capability. The hero contest conducted by a well known magazine has kept this star on edge. It has renewed his ambition with double force. Miss Stonehouse, in the role of Ruth Thomas, gives a splendid interpretation of that character. This production is booked for release Friday, February 20th.

Scene from "The Other Girl" (Essanay).

A NEW WRINKLE.

The Box Office Attraction Film Rental Company, which was organized by William Fox, the well-known purveyor of good amusement, has gone into the feature renting business on a large and novel scale. The company aims to aid the exhibitor in the important function of selecting his program, especially the feature part thereof. From hundreds of features submitted four choices are made every week. To make these features especially attractive the company has engaged a musical and picture expert who arranges special music for each feature. The score then becomes part of the feature and is furnished to the exhibitor. To show just how much the right music adds to a good feature, Mr. Fox had arranged an exhibition in the Academy of Music to which many hundreds of exhibitors had been invited. The features which constituted the program were the three reel feature "Wives," by the Ramo Company, and the three reel feature "The Lotus Dancer," imported by the True Feature Company. These two features will be released on the 9th and 11th of February, respectively. The verdict of the attending exhibitors as to the complete success of the musical numbers for these features was unanimous. Many of them assured Mr. Fox and his representative, Mr. Carlos, that they had blazed a new trail in the matter of presentation. It was evident that extraordinary care had been bestowed both in the selection of the features and in the adaptation of the music to the pictures.

"SOLDIERS OR FORTUNE" BREAKING RECORDS.

Richard Harding Davis' "Soldiers of Fortune," with Dustin Farnum in the leading role, the latest release of the All-Star Feature Corporation, is enjoying a splendid run of popular approval.

Recent showings of the picture in Newark, where it is booked by the Modern Film Company, has proved it to be a big hit in that city and the stamp of approval has been placed upon the picture by exhibitors of other New Jersey cities.

From San Francisco and the Golgate Feature Service comes information that "Soldiers of Fortune" is going like wildfire and playing to capacity at every showing.

William Fox's theater in New York City opened the New York exhibition of the picture on January 25, and it was generally pronounced a worthy successor to the other All-Star productions, "Arizona" and "Checkers."

"BESS, THE OUTCAST" (Beauty Films).

A subject of fine dramatic quality and beautiful photography throughout. Margaret Fischer plays the lead and admirably interprets the unfortunate waif, the daughter of a former stage robber. The forsaken and despised girl is compelled to buffet her way, only to be scorned, frowned upon or ridiculed for a misfortune for which she is not in the least responsible.

Scene from "Bess the Outcast" (Beauty Films).

Human impulses are present and the poor girl is aching for a kind deed or word to spur on her ambitions. Miss Fischer is given a splendid opportunity to display her versatility and she rises to the occasion with a grandeur that is sublime. Harry Pollard plays opposite with a large and capable supporting cast. The subject is scheduled for release January 28th.

"THORNS OF THE GAY WHITE WAY" (Warner's).

Fathers sometimes make terrible mistakes, and one of the most frequent is to allow their daughters to grow up in boarding schools away from the protecting influence of their homes. The father in "Thorns of the Gay White Way," although the proprietor of a tenement house dive, is really a believer in the "square deal" and fairly worships his motherless daughter, whom he has placed in a private boarding school. There is a splendid moral lesson to be gained from this gripping Warner's Feature. It tears the veil of glamor from New York's wickedest thoroughfare and shows plainly its pitfalls and dangers. No one will be able to see the downfall of this innocent girl without a shudder to think that such conditions still exist in our great cities. The producers have succeeded in painting the "Gay White Way," as Broadway is called, so black that no one seeing this production could ever be tempted to follow its alluring lights. Yet there is a story of great interest carried through the three parts—one that the observer will follow breathlessly.

"THE LAW OF HIS KIND" (Rex).

In America, where every man is more or less taken at his own face value—where the misdeeds of a black sheep could not possibly ostracize other members of a family, we know little of the foolish family honor code. But there are those who, having carried from ancestral Europe the belief in "cast" and peculiar motions of the relative equation of the family relationship, hang their heads in shame and seek the blackness of seclusion when one of their own disgraces himself. However, in the rapid strides of civilization, tolerance is coming to be a big virtue and the old European law of "cast" that says a man or woman should die rather than reflect dishonor on his relatives is regarded with disfavor.

The Colonel in this virile story, the locale of which is Glasgow and Sterling House, Scotland, during the South African War, believed that the girl he married was virtuous and good. When he found out different his heart broke—not necessarily because of his love for the girl, but because he could not see his name linked with scandal. But it was the law of his kind. The picture is in two reels and will be released February 12. A synopsis of the story will be found elsewhere in this issue.

"BLIND FATE" (Blinkhorn).

A very pretty and pathetic story unfolds itself on the screen in the course of these two reels. A solitary miner lives with his blind daughter in the wilderness. While his daughter is out on some errand the old man is murdered by an outlaw. The sightless girl realizes the dreadful thing that has happened but cannot prevent the escape of the murderer. She breaks his finger in the struggle and this clue, together with a harsh cruel laugh, are her only means of discovering the criminal. Fate, however, comes to her aid in a most thrilling and unexpected manner, the murderer is discovered and her father's spirit is avenged. The photography of this feature develops some novel stereoscopic effects and is of superb quality all the way through. The acting leaves nothing to be desired.

Scene from "Blind Fate" (Blinkhorn).

"FITZHUGH'S RIDE" (Lubin).

This is another of the famous Lubin Civil War stories, one of the love tales which has helped to soften the sad realism of the terrible days of strife between the brave boys of our country. Fitzhugh is a prototype of young Lochinvar, as daring and romantic as ever man who wooed fair lady. The atmosphere of battle is tinged with heroics and a beautiful love romance ends the thrilling picture.

Robert Fitzhugh and Cyril Carroll are suitors for the hand of Elizabeth Manners. Fitzhugh is a virile, impulsive young man of the South, while Carroll is his opposite. Fitzhugh discovers that he is the favorite, and one day dashes up on horseback and carries the girl bodily from Carroll's presence. He gets Elizabeth's promise to marry him after the war. Both men enlist and Fitzhugh is elected captain, while Carroll is appointed post master. Many letters are written by the lovers, but Carroll intercepts them and persuades Fitzhugh that the girl has transferred her affections to himself. An engagement is ordered and Fitzhugh, believing that Carroll's life is the more valuable to the girl he loves, sends him through the lines for safety. He then discovers letters half burned that satisfies him of Carroll's treachery. It is too late to recall Carroll, who climbs a tree and escapes being shot. The battle over Fitzhugh is taken prisoner by the Federals and Carroll seeks out Elizabeth, and by persuading her that Fitzhugh cares no more for her and is probably dead, she agrees to a hasty wedding. Fitzhugh escapes and on horseback rides into and down the aisle of the church, seizes his sweetheart and carries her off, pursued by the cavalry, which he outpaces, and secures his bride. The story was written by George Terwilliger.

MUCH PUBLICITY FOR SELIG'S BIG SERIES.

"The Adventures of Kathlyn" is conceded by keen-visioned business men of the picture business to have been the best innovation of its kind ever advanced to increase the interest, enlarge the sales and stimulate universal curiosity and cash reciprocation of anything ever advanced in the moving picture business. For several years past, editors and picture men publicists have given their most serious thought to plans that should enlarge the selling scope of the picture product, and it remained for W. N. Selig to show the way by making a friendly alliance with the big powers of publicity, the American daily newspapers, to take an intimate, personal interest in the moving picture, calling attention to it with all the enthusiasm of something new and strange instead of following the merely conventional lines. This publicity has cleverly not only been localized, but nationalized, and at the same time taken on a news value and has been intensified through the medium of description and imagination; so that it has both reality and romance to forward and intensify interest.

NEW FEATURE FILM COMPANY.

A new company, recently organized under the name of the Rolands Feature Film Co., opened its executive offices at 145 West 45th St., Rooms 711-712. It is the purpose of this company to manufacture, import and export features of first class quality. Samuel Q. Edelstein is manager and George K. Rolands director. The first production of the company, a four reel feature, is in course of preparation, and will soon be released.

"THE HERMIT" (American).

In keeping with the high quality and merit of recent two part "Flying A" productions, the American Film Mfg. Co. again comes to the front with a two part feature throbbing with human interest.

Ed Coxen plays the part of the Hermit, who, because of circumstantial evidence, bears the stigma of a criminal, renounces society and seeks refuge in California. After fifteen years the hermit is accidentally discovered by his relatives and is finally persuaded to return to his native city, where he resumes the thread of life to a happy climax.

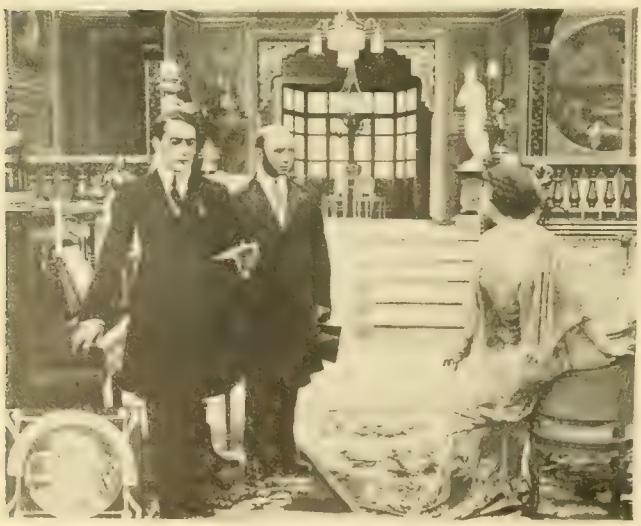
Mr. Coxen's acting is in thorough keeping with the part. Miss Greenwood plays opposite and is worthy of commendation, as are also George Field, the villain, and Charlotte Burton as ingenue.

CRYSTAL TO RELEASE COMEDY SUNDAYS.

The Crystal Film Company, of New York, has come to a realization that there is not enough comedy being released in proportion to the number of dramatic subjects. For this reason and because the Crystal comedies have met with such signal success, it has been decided to replace the Sunday dramatic release of this company with a regular full-reel comedy. This new policy will go into effect on February 15. The usual Tuesday split-reel Crystal comedy will continue to be released as heretofore.

GLORIA FILMS ARE GOING WELL.

The American representatives of the Gloria Films, Messrs. Scofield and Lakin, are reporting great success in the sale of their great feature "Love Everlasting." They announce the coming of important new releases in the near future. The accompanying picture is from "Love Everlasting."



Scene from "Love Everlasting" (Gloria).

AUGUSTUS CARNEY AS "UNIVERSAL IKE."

Augustus Carney, the widely known cowboy comedian of the screen, will hereafter be featured under the Universal-Joker brand as "Universal Ike." This name will be combined with a catch phrase: "There's a universal liking for Universal Ike."

"Universal Ike Gets a Goat" is the title of the first comedy that will feature this laugh-provoking cowboy. Mr. Carney has now been at Universal City, California, about a month, and during that time he has found his time crowded, what with assisting in picking out a suitable company of players to support him, preparing fresh costumes and playing his first release.

Scene from "Universal Ike Gets a Goat" (Universal).

Harry Edwards, a man of long experience in the producing end of motion pictures and recently of the Majestic Company, was secured especially to direct the series of Western comedies featuring "Universal Ike."

"THE COUNTY SEAT WAR." (Kalem).

This is a strong typically American play in three reels which will go well with every audience. The story deals with a familiar subject but one which has so far never been utilized in motion pictures. Two factions in a county are at war, and all through the events of the political feud there runs the thread of a most romantic love story. There is a good deal of startling realism in the play. The different scenes and settings are particularly well selected and notable for their absolute fidelity to life. The county fair, for instance, with its politician's day is particularly good. The acting is good throughout and the photography faultless.

STATE RIGHT PURCHASE.

The Famous Players' Exchange, 1331 Vine St., Philadelphia, and 71 West 23rd Street, New York, has purchased the first twelve productions of the Jesse Lasky productions for Eastern Pennsylvania and New Jersey, and also the Famous Players output for same territory.

"THE SQUAW MAN" (Lasky).

The accompanying photograph is one among the first (stills) sent East by Mr. DeMille showing how the Jesse Lasky Feature Play Co. is getting on in the production of its first release "The Squaw Man." The picture group was taken at Green River, Montana.

Scene from "The Squaw Man" (Lasky).

The Lasky Company, numbering over one hundred persons, travelled from lower California nearly two thousand miles to Green River, Montana, covering seven states and crossing three mountain ranges in the making of "The Squaw Man."

"BETWEEN SAVAGE AND TIGER" (Cines-Kleine).

Early in February, Kleine will launch a six part animal feature entitled "Between Savage and Tiger," made by the Cines Company and now being widely advertised as the greatest of animal subjects in Europe in which three tigers, a water buffalo and a doe are killed. This is the first animal picture attempt of the Cines Company on a scale so elaborate. The entire six reels fairly sparkle with thrilling action and aside from the death of the tigers there are some other extremely unusual and unique feats. In one scene Anthony Novelli rides a horse at breakneck speed under a tree in the branches of which a native is concealed. The native, hanging by his hands from a branch, slips his legs around Novelli's body and jerks him clear out of the saddle, a feat so daringly done and so original that it is sure to win applause. Another of the big scenes shows the total destruction of a large freight-boat with several hundred passengers, including women and children leaping into a high running sea from the deck of a burning vessel. The scenes of the six reels were laid in Africa and later transferred to the jungles of India. The male lead is played by Anthony Novelli of "Quo Vadis?" and "Antony and Cleopatra" fame while the female lead is played by Marie Hesperia. Lea Guinchi, who played opposite Novelli in "Quo Vadis?" plays Sarama an Indian chief's daughter.

KEYSTONE PLANT ENLARGED.

The new program of three a week, and a two-reel special every month, recently adopted by the Keystone Company, of Los Angeles, has caused Managing Director Mack Sennett to hustle up all departments of the studio. A new stage, 60 x 80 feet, has just been completed, which with the old one, now gives a total of over 300 square feet of working room. All sets, props, and furnishings have been added accordingly and there is now enough material to easily keep eight or ten companies going. Four new directors, with the same number of cameramen have also been added. This brings the list to a total of seven directors with the accompanying seven companies of players. And all are kept constantly at work turning out Keystone comedies.

MELIES' NEW POLICY.

The Melies Company will, for the present and for some time in the future, discontinue the making of educational pictures and will instead devote itself entirely to the production of comedies at the rate of one a week. As the market is always short on good comedy, it is expected that this move will meet with the general approval of all exhibitors. Nothing is prized more by the exhibitors than a genuine laugh producer. The Melies Company will try hard to supply these genuine laugh producers at the rate of one a week. This will make the new trade mark popular both to exhibitor and to the public generally.

ECLECTIC AGAIN AFTER INFRINGERS.

The Eclectic Film Co., of New York, has always been determined in the matter of protecting its copyrights, and the following letter received at this office is evidence of its activities in that direction:

Editor Moving Picture World,

Dear Sir: We have struck another death blow to the piratical practice of the exploiters who insist upon infringing upon our productions. This company has been instrumental in seizing several films in the past, notably "The Mysteries of Paris," which figured prominently in a seizure some weeks back. The fact is well known throughout the trade that we have all our features copyrighted, which fact has been a source of great confidence to our customers. This confidence we have at all times endeavored to foster to the satisfaction of the entire trade. Therefore, when we learned of a surreptitious booking of an evident copy of our six-reel feature, "A Man's Shadow," we took immediate steps to have the same confiscated. Acting under our instructions, Mr. I. C. Chadwick, our attorney, proceeded to take what action was necessary. Armed with a warrant, and accompanied by a Deputy United States Marshal and an employee of the company to identify the film, Mr. Chadwick went to the Park Theater, 106 Avenue B, corner 6th Street, New York City, and took possession of the eight-reel feature, "In the Hour of Justice," which is a copy of "A Man's Shadow," the only difference being that the latter has been cut to six reels. This film is now in possession of the United States Marshal, William Henkle.

We wish to emphasize at this time that we have firmly decided to do all in our power to eliminate all infringers, copyists, and illegitimate importers of films, who seek to foist their wares on the market. We are ready and willing to stamp out this evil and will back this policy with all the resources at our command.

Very truly yours,
ECLECTIC FILM CO.

LARGE FILM POSTER CONCERN ORGANIZED.

A large newly equipped lithograph establishment has just been completed by the Erie Lithograph Co., at Erie, Pa. Practically the entire plant is to be utilized in turning out posters to fulfill the rapidly increasing demand of moving picture concerns for high-grade posters.

One very interesting feature of this new company is that it has for its president and manager one of the pioneer poster lithographers of this country, Mr. F. J. Walker. The splendid organization of artists and pressmen was selected from the combined forces of the Erie branch of the U. S. Lithograph Co. and the Buffalo Courier Lithograph Co., of Buffalo, N. Y., which branches the U. S. Lithograph Co. recently discontinued. Most of the artists and pressmen in the new company were former employes of Mr. Walker before he sold his plant to the lithograph trust a few years ago, and own stock in the new company, thereby showing their faith not only in their former employer, but in the stimulating effect of the moving picture business upon the poster lithograph business.

J. H. GENTER COMPANY EXPANDING.

Turning out a complete screen every fifteen minutes is the factory capacity that the makers of the Mirroroide screen find necessary to keep up with the demand for their well known product and they expect to reach this output during next month. To accomplish this, they are now utilizing thirty-five thousand square feet of floor surface in their Newburgh factory. Film of American manufacture is not the only American product in the moving picture industry that is finding its way to every part of the world, for the Genter Company shipped two screens to Hong Kong, China, and four screens to Southport, England, last week. This latter item is still further evidence of the advertising results obtained from this paper. The utmost attention to each individual order and the guaranteed satisfaction that the manufacturers place back of the screen has contributed in no small measure to their popularity.

CANADIAN FEATURE FILM EXCHANGE.

Arrangements have been completed whereby the International Feature Film Corporation, Limited, of Montreal, Que., has been granted the exclusive distributing privilege in Eastern Canada for the Great Northern Film Co.'s special and preferred feature attractions. The arrangement already is in effect and with the co-operation of the Great Northern Company, the International Feature Film Corporation should be able to give prompt and efficient service in the important territory mentioned. The International Feature Film Corporation is under the management of film men who are thoroughly familiar with all branches of the business. The concern has its offices in the New Birks Building in Montreal.

MUTUAL FORCES TO COAST.

D. W. Griffith, director-general for the Mutual Film Corporation, and his staff of directors and scenario department left New York for Los Angeles on Tuesday, January 27. With Mr. Griffith went James Kirkwood and Edward Morrissey, directors, and Frank E. Woods and Russel B. Smith, of the scenario department. A large company of players were in the party.

"A DAUGHTER OF EVE."

The Great Northern Special Feature Film Co. announces that its current release, "A Daughter of Eve," a three-reel feature production, is calculated to prove one of the most attractive of the many strong photodramas placed upon the market by this firm. As the name indicates, it is a story of human interest, and is said to abound in gripping scenes. One of these that is sure to cause many a thrill is that of the courtroom, where an innocent man has just been convicted of murder. The customary farewells are being said and the prisoner is being led away, when a tramp leaves his seat among the spectators and admits himself to be the murderer. Much of the interest of the photodrama hinges about Claire Esmark, for she is one of those women over whom men are apt to rave, and not unlike the first of her sex, she is the cause of much trouble and finally a tragedy. Those who have had the privilege of seeing the production agree that the story is unusually strong, the staging up to the Great Northern standard and the acting a credit to the members of the stock company.

"WRECKED IN MID-AIR" (Kleine Eclipse).

George Kleine will release January 27 a three-part Eclipse subject, entitled "Wrecked in Mid-Air." This is a fascinating story with most of the photographs made in the Bleriot monoplane factory at Paris. "Arizona Bill," that intrepid Eclipse star noted for his many devil-may-care feats in pictures, plays the lead. He probably breaks even his own remarkable records for daring stunts when his monoplane blows up in mid-air and comes crashing to the ground in front of the camera. Had this happened to a legitimate aviator, his escape from death would have made an Associated Press item the world over. As it is, there are no "cuts" or trick camera work to deceive anyone. That scene in which the act occurs is punctuated by no sub-titles or "cuts" and shows him enter the vehicle, rise 75 or 100 feet in the air and fall to earth amid a blaze of smoke and fire. His wife, Mrs. Joe Hamman, accompanies him.

"LITTLE BILLY" THE KEYSTONE KID.

"Little Billy," Keystone's two-year-old star, is again at work in a kid picture. This time Billy carries the lead throughout an entire reel, including a holdup, running away with the cash of a Punch and Judy show, and foiling a couple of villains. All of this he does with his usual facial expressions and a dramatic comprehension away beyond his years. "Little Billy" will take part in all the future kid pictures put out by Keystone, and which are becoming almost as popular as the comedies played by Keystone grown-ups.

Notes of the Trade.

ART is now in pursuit of John Bunny. It is anxious to immortalize his mobile features in plaster-of-paris. Nothing has been said of marble and bronze, but it is presumed that is only a question of time. A noted Brazilian sculptor has requested photographs of Bunny, from which he says he will make a most perfect likeness to sell at a price that will bring this marvelous work of art within the reach of all.

Elwood E. deHart, assistant sales manager of the Nicholas Power Co., is a mechanical expert, having gained his knowledge after several years in the automobile business. The Power Co. certainly picks out the "live ones."

On Tuesday, February 17th, George Kleine will release the Celio subject, "The Artist's Model," the picture which created so much talk in Europe recently. The story centers about a beautiful shepherdess who becomes the wife of a famous artist and leads him to destruction. Francesca Bertini does some exceptionally beautiful work in the part of the shepherdess and later the pampered idol of Paris salons.

The American Theater Curtain & Supply Company reports the sale of two more Radium Gold Fibre Screens to I. Burnstein, of Springfield, Ill. One of these goes to the Springfield house and the other to Lincoln, Ill. This makes the sixth screen now in use in the Burnstein houses.

Edwin Barbour, who wrote "When the Earth Trembled," the three-reel Lubin feature now scoring such a success, has returned to the Lubin studio, after an absence of six weeks. Mr. Barbour went to Bermuda to recuperate from an illness.

Harry Edwards, a man of long experience in the production end of the motion picture business and recently of the Majestic Company, is the newest director of the Pacific coast studios of the Universal. Mr. Edwards will direct an "Alkali Ike" series of comedies in which Augustus Carney, of Essanay fame, will be featured under the character name of "Universal Ike."

RECONCILED IN BLOOD (Feb. 10).—Jim Claiborne and Nat Hawkins, Kentucky mountaineers, are heads of clans who have been at war with each other. They meet in the village on market day, and Hawkins takes a shot at Claiborne, but his gun hand is knocked up by Mrs. Claiborne, so Hawkins leaves, swearing "to get" Claiborne. When the families return to their mountain cabins, each starts out on a man-hunt for the other. Hawkins intends to ambush Claiborne, but when Mrs. Claiborne sees his grim face at the cabin window, she quickly sends a note by her small boy to the revenue officers, telling them that Hawkins, a moonshiner, is in the neighborhood. The woman then uses her wits to detain the unwelcome visitor as long as possible in the hopes that the officers will arrive.

The boy delivers the message but the strenuous ride is too much for him and he falls from his horse of heart failure. Hawkins sees him fall and carries him in. Then he rushes for a doctor and brings him. The latter declares that the only hope for the child's life is a transfusion of blood. The poor mother is too weak to submit to such a strain. Thereupon Hawkins offers his own veins and gives up his blood so the child of his mortal enemy might live. Mrs. Claiborne is now filled with regret and remorse at having given information to the officers. Claiborne walks in and is about to shoot Hawkins when his wife interposes and tells him the sacrifice Hawkins has endured. Claiborne accepts his hand in forgiveness and the feudists are reconciled.

A STRENUOUS SCOOP (Feb. 11).—Bobbie, after considerable effort, secures a job on the reportorial staff of a big daily, and waits patiently for an assignment. The chief of detectives, who has heard that "Dago" Frank, a noted criminal, is in the city, sends two of his best operatives on the trail. The city editor, learning of the coming of Mme. Bordica, an opera singer, traveling incognito, assigns the tremulous Bobbie to see her, and instructs him under no circumstances to come back without an interview. The famous song-bird has received considerable additions for her wardrobe, including a number of wigs, and having examined them in her apartments, goes out for a stroll. In the interim, the detectives hot-foot after "Dago" Frank, run him into the hotel in which Bordica is stopping, and there lose the scent. The criminal, by capricious chance, ducks into the room of the singer, and observing the wigs and gowns strewn about, promptly proceeds to disguise himself in feminine finery.

The industrious Bobbie, having ascertained the room number of Mme. Bordica, and fearing a turn-down by telephone, boldly goes up, knocks, and then waits patiently for an answer—until "Dago" Frank emerges, thoroughly disguised for further travel. Bobbie immediately gives chase, notebook in hand, but the pursued one will not linger. Bobbie, not to be outdone, chases him down the fire-escape and through the town, right past the two disgruntled and disappointed detectives, and into a park. The crook, having a short lead, climbs into a tree and endeavors to hide in the foliage. He cannot, however, escape the eagle eye of Bobbie, who climbs the next tree, gets out his notebook and prepares to have the desired interview. About this time the park policeman appears on the scene and orders them to terra firma. Bobbie comes down readily enough but it takes more than moral suasion to get "Dago" Frank. The pair are carried to the police station. At the station "Dago" Frank endeavors to wreak vengeance on Bobbie, and the policeman in trying to hold him back, pulls off the wig and exposes the criminal. Bobbie not only gets an interview for a scare head on the front page of his paper, but likewise, a thousand-dollar reward for the capture of the noted criminal.

THE MISTRESS OF HIS HOUSE (Feb. 12).—When Dr. Richard Crane brings home his girl-wife that has been presided over by his widowed sister, he assures the latter that she will still be mistress of the house, as his young wife knows little or nothing of domestic detail. It is not without concern that the elder woman, set in her ways, views the coming of the girlish stranger almost as an intruder. The bride enters the secret domain of the darkened old parlor, whisks off the covers from the beloved furniture that have guarded it for years against dust and use, and with one full sweep, robs the room of all its straight-laced arrangement.

The climax comes, however, when the widow, on returning home, finds Claire, the young wife, and neighboring children she had lured to the house, romping about the beloved parlor. The outraged one, in her excitement, upsets the table that falls upon Claire's ankle, breaking a bone. Then Mrs. Sherman, the widow runs for the doctor. In rummaging for bandages in Claire's bureau drawer, she comes upon an infant's gown, sadly bungled in the cutting, pathetic in the awkward sewing—a furtive attempt made by Claire's unskilled but loving hands. Then memories flood upon the woman, softening her by the discovery, and when Claire is convalescing, the treasured scraps are brought from concealment and the reconciliation between the two women is complete. The whole story glows with heart interest.

THEIR LESSON (Feb. 13).—Ralph Holden and his wife, Molly, are a fashionable pair with ambitions far beyond their means, and are soon very much in debt. At the breakfast table one morning, Ralph receives a letter threatening a law suit, while Molly gets a missive from the butcher, declaring that immediate settlement is necessary. That same afternoon, she entertains her women friends at bridge, and when the game is finished is obliged to give her I. O. U. to Mrs. Morley, one of her guests, for $100.00. On his way home, Ralph meets Tom Norton, a race track tout, who gives him a tip on a "good thing." When he arrives home, Molly confesses her losses, which is very annoying to Ralph. The following afternoon Norton again visits Ralph's office, and he tells him that Prince, who is to run the first race, cannot lose, but Ralph is now skeptical and refuses to play the tip. A few moments later the telephone rings and his wife tells him that Mrs. Marley has called, demanding immediate settlement. Ralph grabs $100.00 of the firm's money, and places it on Prince, to win at odds of five to one. He is under nerve pressure, and almost collapses when he hears that another horse has won. He is about to leave when he learns that the winner has been disqualified and the race given to Prince. He replaces the money, so unceremoniously borrowed, returns home and straightens out his wife's account, and then, when he reviews the fact how close he came to being a defaulter, they doubly resolve upon a reform, move into more modest apartments, Molly gives up bridge and sensibly resolves to do her own housework.

VITAGRAPH.

THE WINNER WINS (Feb. 9).—While out watching the practice for the coming big road race at Santa Monica, Cal., Virginia Nelson, with her father and George Sanborn, her wealthy admirer, meets Earl Cooper, the famous driver and favorite. That evening she receives an invitation to meet him at the track the next day and go for a spin with him around the course. Sanborn tries to prevent Virginia from going, but she gets permission from her father and accepts the invitation much to Sanborn's chagrin. Love awakens between Cooper and Virginia. The great racing driver asks the father for her hand. He is told that Virginia cannot marry any man who is unable to support her. The father does not believe in having to support a son-in-law. Virginia pleads with her father, but gets the same reply.

Earl's attentions to Marion are noticed by Sanborn. His jealousy is aroused. He goes to some ruffians on the outskirts of the town and tells them that he will give them a large sum of money if they will set fire to the motordrome before the race and burn up Cooper's racer. They take advantage of the offer and do as he tells them. The motordrome is soon a blazing mass of timbers. The glaring flames shoot skyward and dense clouds of heavy smoke roll up from the shriveling fuel.

Cooper discovers the fire in time to save his car. Virginia tells him that if he wins the race and the big prize she will marry him. Cooper tells the girl that he will win the race or die. He makes good his promise. After a grueling race, in competition with the fastest cars in the world, he comes in first over the finishing line. Thousands of spectators cheer him as he dashes in, the winner. None are as happy as Virginia, who jumps down from her box in the grandstand and rushes over to meet the man who has won not only the race, but her heart. Her father consents to their marriage and blesses their union.

MASTER OF THE MINE (Special—2 parts—Feb. 10).—Having lost his wealth, James Arnold, an aged aristocrat, applies to Philip Berkow, a wealthy mine owner, of the middle class socially, for a loan. Berkow proposes that they make a matrimonial alliance between Arnold's daughter, Eugenie, and Berkow's son, Arthur, one having the wealth and the other the social prestige. Anxious to maintain her own social standing, Eugenie reluctantly agrees, while Arthur, who loves the girl, also consents. The miners are on the point of an uprising in protest against certain conditions at the mine. They hold up the bridal party, but are dispersed by Hartmann, who is against violence. The wedding guests gather for the banquet, the elder Berkow lifts his glass to drink to the health of the bride and falls dead of heart failure.

A delegation of miners, headed by Hartmann, call upon Arthur and insist upon their demands. Arthur defies them. Meanwhile, Eugenie's father has received an unexpected legacy and persuades Eugenie to leave her husband. She goes to his office and sees the situation between her husband and the angry miners, which brings to her her first realization of real respect for Arthur's manliness. She tells him of her intentions of leaving him. He listens to her calmly and tells her she can go. The miners plan to blow up the mine. They place the powder and are about to return when part of the tunnel caves in. Arthur rushes to the mine and goes down the shaft alone to rescue the man. Eugenie rushes to the mine as the rescued miners are drawn up, announcing that all are saved except Arthur. Eugenie pleads for them to rescue her husband; all refuse. She starts down alone. Hartmann springs into the bucket with her. They find Arthur and bring him safely up, amid the cheers of the crowd. The explosion comes as Eugenie and Arthur stand apart, and, looking into each other's eyes, realize that their love is mutual.

SONNY JIM IN SEARCH OF A MOTHER (Feb. 11).—To sum up the situation, Daddy Jim discovers, after the death of his young wife, that "men were never made to be mothers to little fellows," so he decides, though it wrenches his heart to part with him, to send Sonny Jim to stay with his Aunt Kate, who has a brood of her own. Sonny's little cousins have a way of teasing, and when Sonny asks them innocently how he can find a new mother for his Daddy Jim, they tell him in all seriousness that new mothers "grow on trees."

Sonny Jim sets out to look for a mother that grows on a tree. At length he finds her. The fact that a cow has driven her to take refuge there does not trouble him at all. When Daddy Jim, searching frantically for Sonny, discovers him talking to the girl he is very much surprised, especially as she is up the tree. Sonny asks his father to "pick his new mother for him." Though at first Daddy Jim is somewhat embarrassed by such a demand, he is aided by the girl, who has a very gracious disposition. Sonny is insistent, so there is nothing for Daddy Jim to do but comply with his wishes.

Of course Daddy falls in love with the girl. He could not help falling in love with such a pretty and attractive girl. It becomes a case of love at first sight; only, while Daddy Jim loses his heart to just a girl, the girl loses her heart to a man and a boy all at the same time. She is willing to be taken down from the tree by Daddy Jim, though she has to explain that she really did not grow there. She secretely blesses the cow that chased her so unceremoniously. She is sorry that the poor cow can never realize to what happiness it was chasing her. Not being able to tell all this to the cow she tells it to Daddy Jim instead, who proves a very willing listener.

SOME STEAMER SCOOPING (Feb. 12).—The Baron Lafitte is in love with and proposes to Adelaide Burton, daughter of Andrew Burton, a wealthy manufacturer. Clara Lane, a newspaper reporter, has been assigned to watch the movements of the Baron. She is further instructed to make a scoop of their movements. Tom Drake is in love with Clara, and is her persistent follower throughout. Clara is making progress on scoop No. 1 when she sees the Baron slip a ring on the finger of the charming Adelaide. An extremely youthful stowaway is scooped out of the hold, furnishing scoop No. 2. The poor child is about to be delivered over to the Captain when little Helen Reigel and her mother become interested, and in turn interest the Baron in the little delinquent. The Baron, who is good-natured and big-hearted, adopts the youngster, much to Adelaide's extreme disgust.

The Baron and Adelaide quarrel, and their engagement is abruptly terminated. In the meantime, the Baron, through Drake, has met Clara, and she falls in love with the nobleman, to Drake's great chagrin. The breaking off of the Baron's engagement with Adelaide gives Clara more newspaper material and a ray of hope. The Baron quickly recovers from his recent unpleasantness, and in turn becomes interested in Clara. The latter, who has kept her real identity a secret, has qualms about sending in her big scoop to the papers, now that she herself loves the central figure involved. Accidentally, the Baron discovers Clara's reason for being aboard, and thinking she has purposely ensnared him for the purpose of getting news out of him, reproaches her bitterly. Through the timely mediation of the Baron's adopted protege, matters are straightened out, and the Baron pulls the biggest "scoop" of all when he captures the willing Clara.

BUNNY'S BIRTHDAY (Feb. 13).—Bunny tries to borrow his neighbor Smith's silverware for a birthday spread he is preparing. He is put off with Smith's promise that he will send it over as soon as his wife returns and he gains her consent. Upon his wife's appearance, however, Smith is refused permission to loan her silver to the Bunnys. Meanwhile, the Bunnys wait impatiently for the arrival of the silver. During the Smiths' absence at the opera that evening, burglar Bill invades their house and robs them of their silver. He is pursued by a policeman, and in running by Bunny's house, comes upon Bunny just departing for Smith's home. In order to rid himself of suspicion, burglar Bill pushes the silver into Bunny's hands and tells him to take it. Bunny, thinking it a queer way for Smith to send the silver, re-enters his house and soon the silver graces the board, contributing largely to the impressions the Bunnys make upon their guests. Burglar Bill escapes and celebrates his getaway. He is arrested for drunkenness. Next day, Bunny returning the silver, is arrested for robbery. His explanations are laughed at, and not until burglar Bill is compelled to confess is Bunny's innocence re-established.

CHILDREN OF THE FEUD (Special—2 parts—Feb. 14).—Jabez Morton goes to a nearby field to drive some cows to an upper pasture. He pulls down part of Carson Belfield's pasture fence so as to drive the cows through. Belfield, who is sitting on a stump smoking his pipe watching his two children, Walton and Hulda, rises angrily and, rifle in hand, goes toward Jabez. Belfield orders Jabez to stop pulling down the fence and when he refuses, shoots him. James Morton, with his wife, Eliza, and their two young boys, Boone and William, run to the pasture. They vow to revenge Jabez. Fifteen years later, William and Boone while walking in the mountains, see Walton and Hulda. William fires at them, but misses his aim. Boone refuses to shoot, saying, "I do not make war on women." A few days later, Boone is sitting alone in the mountains and is surprised by Hulda. He lowers his rifle and laughs. Angered by his manner, Hulda fires at him, hitting him in the knee. Ashamed of her act, she kneels beside him and bandages his wound. When she leaves, her cheeks are flushed and there is a soft light in her eyes. Boone looks toward her with deep interest.

That night Hulda takes food to Boone. He seizes her hand and presses it to his lips. When she comes back the next day she is followed by her brother, Walton, who witnesses an affectionate greeting. He confronts Hulda as she is leaving and reviles her for her conduct. When he starts to shoot Boone she throws herself in the way and shrieks. Morris, a preacher, and William Morton hasten near. William forces Walton to surrender himself, and leads him off. The preacher goes with Hulda to Boone and joins the young couple in marriage. When he tells of this to the Mortons, William and his father, enraged, rush to find the couple. William fires at them, but misses. Walton and William engage in a desperate fight. Both fall down the mountainside and are killed. The two old fathers are overcome with grief when they see the tragedy and, in sight of Hulda, Boone and the preacher, they clasp hands over their dead sons, and agree to end their long warfare.

THE COUNTRY SEAT WAR (Special—2 parts—Feb. 9).—Rodney Gilbert and Elsie Gordon are sweethearts. Rodney is the captain of the local militia and son of the District-Attorney. Zeigler, an unscrupulous politician, also loves Elsie. To further his ends, he nominates the girl's father to run against Gilbert, who comes up for re-election. Gordon is defeated after a bitter campaign. In rage he orders Elsie to cease her friendship with Rodney. Later, the citizens of Rayton, headed by Zeigler and Gordon, descend upon the Court House at Elk City, Gilbert's home, for the purpose of stealing the county records. Two militiamen are on guard. Zeigler mortally wounds one of the men, Marvin. The man scrawls a dying message in the pages of a book, which he hurls out of the window. Fisher, the other guard, is gagged and bound. The Court House is accidentally set afire. Fisher escapes and gives the alarm.

Rodney and his men pursue the Raytonites. The latter fortify themselves in a barn. A hot battle ensues. The raiders are finally captured and placed under arrest. Gordon is charged with having murdered Marvin. Elsie and her mother plead with Gilbert to have the crime investigated. Rodney also urges his father to look into the matter. The following day Marvin's message is found by boys, who turn it over to one of Rodney's men. Realizing its importance, the man takes it to District Attorney Gilbert. Zeigler is confronted with the evidence of his crime. Overcome by this message from the dead, the man breaks down and confesses. Gordon is freed. In gratitude he gives Rodney his consent to Marry Elsie.

INDIAN FATE (Special—2 parts—Feb. 11).—Florence schemes to marry Charles because of his wealth. She succeeds in securing an invitation to accompany Charles and his mother on a trip West. In the Pueblo country, the boy meets Wildflower, an Indian maiden. He induces the girl to elope with him. The two are married by a priest in a monastery near by. A year later, Charles brings his wife East to his parents. Wildflower charms the friends of the Bartells. Florence, however, causes trouble between Wildflower and Charles. Before long, the husband becomes ashamed of his wife.

Shortly afterward a son is born. Because the infant shows its Indian blood, Charles leaves the house in a rage. Broken-hearted, Wildflower decides to return to her own people. Two years later, Charles secures a divorce and marries Florence. Eighteen years pass. Eagle Heart, a half-breed, attending the Government School, falls in love with Bess, Florence's daughter. The lad is about to return to his people. His sweetheart promises to induce her parents to come to the Pueblo country, his home.

Bess prevails upon her father to make the trip. Charles and his daughter reach the village, where the former met Wildflower years before. While her father is examining some Indian ware, Bess and Big Heart steal off. Later, Charles comes upon the two. He angrily forces Bess from her lover's arms. An old squaw makes way to the spot. Big Heart greets her as his mother. The woman gazes upon Charles, who starts back. It is Wildflower. The latter attempts to knife the man, but is disarmed by her son. Thus do the horror-stricken lovers learn that they are brother and sister. Overwhelmed with remorse, Charles turns away.

OUT IN THE RAIN (Feb. 13).—Henry goes to the club after promising his wife to be home early. Falling in with a congenial crowd, he drinks not too wisely, but too well. Overflowing with good spirits, Henry leaves for home. Realizing he must square himself with his wife, the man buys a bunch of violets for her.

Henry enters the house of his next-door neighbor by mistake. The lady of the house phones to Mrs. Henry. When the man tries to enter his own home, he finds himself locked out, despite his tearful pleas.

Making himself comfortable in a veranda chair, Henry falls asleep. A heavy rainstorm comes up. The man buys out a newsboy's entire stock and tries to protect himself against the wet. When morning dawns, Mrs. Henry finds her husband seated in the chair, fast asleep, drenched to the skin, but with the bunch of violets still tightly clutched in one hand.

THE GUN BEHIND THE MAN (Feb. 13).—The Jaytown Volunteer Militia is presented with a cannon. They yank the weapon to the edge of the town for target practice. Bessie and her beau out picnicing decide to eat their lunch in back of the target. They are discovered and warned to flee.

Weary sees the two decamp, leaving their food behind. Hastening to the spot he devours the lunch. A cannon ball comes through the target, knocking poor Weary flat. He flees in terror, but not fast enough to escape other projectiles.

The artillery fire raises havoc with the various stores in the village. Meanwhile Weary climbs a telegraph pole in his effort to escape, but all in vain; a cannon ball comes sailing along and tumbles him off his perch.

THE FATAL CLUES (Feb. 14).—The police request Roy to aid them in tracking the murderer of Langham, found slain in his room at the Piermont Hotel. In looking over the scene of the crime, Roy finds an unset emerald on the floor. A peach bearing tooth-marks is also found by the criminologist. Roy's suspicion is directed toward Hawkins, a society man, who has the suite next to the murdered man's room. Searching the suspect's rooms, Roy finds a fob from which the stone is missing. The emerald fits the setting perfectly. The criminologist takes up his quarters in the mur-

Hawkins discovers the fruit has disappeared. The suspect attempts to shoot the criminologist, but the man is seized and placed under arrest. Taken to police headquarters, Hawkins breaks down and confesses his guilt.

FLOOD OF THE DAL RIVER (Feb. 14).—With the advent of spring, the Dal River, in Sweden, fed by the melting ice and snow upon the hills, overflows its banks and inundates the fields for miles around. A more awe-inspiring sight than this raging torrent making its way to the sea cannot be conceived. A thousand whirlpools and cataracts greet the eye. Huge oaks are plucked up by the roots and swirled along as though mere reeds. This feature presents some superb views of the Dal River during the height of the flood.

BIOGRAPH.

ONE THOUSAND TO ONE SHOT (Feb. 9).—Andy induced the village sports to send him to town to play the races. There he met Chic Confidence with an eye on his easy roll. Chic invited him to an exclusive club that gave secret tips on the races. Village "hard cash" went up on "May-B." Then there was a gorgeous spree on Andy and he was driven back to the alleged club to find out the winnings of "May-B." He found an empty place, the board still standing and written underneath: "'May-Be' still running." Meanwhile, back in the village, the country sports were still arguing as to who would win the most, while Andy is seen still walking the tracks. Perhaps he hadn't the nerve to go back.

SKELLEY BUYS A HOTEL (Feb. 9).—Fate and the ash can gave Skelley and Gilly a checkbook. Not being up in high finance they bought a hotel, affixing their worthy signatures to a check. What needed they of "help?" So they ran the place to suit themselves. A good time they had until the irate proprietor rushed back with the bogus check.

AS IT MIGHT HAVE BEEN (Feb 12).—Another stagestruck girl has her dream of fame rudely shaken. Would that they all got off as easily. She was making one thousand a minute and couldn't count. Funny how she came back to her barber lover, her dream of bliss shattered.

A NEST UNFEATHERED (Feb. 14).—At her dying mother's bedside, Kate promises to bring her young brother into manhood. Eager to gain possession of the farm by marrying Kate, the foreman intends to get rid of the boy. He brings a physician to prove him demented. Kate refuses to believe this. Later, the foreman is a worthless husband to another and for the sake of the son that might have been hers, Kate demonstrates the golden rule.

MELIES.

PLAYING WITH FIRE (Feb. 5).—It is in a large office. The stenographer is in love with one of the clerks, but the latter is very indifferent. Her embarrassment is apparent to the boss, who suggests that he pretend to be in love with the pretty girl and thus arouse the young coxcomb's jealousy. It works. One morning the storm bursts and the young man declares his love, but it is too late. Another seed has been sown that works a very unexpected conclusion.

WINKY WILLY'S DISAPPEARING STUNT (Feb. 5).—Kinky Willy visits his aunt in a village where public opinion has begun to be prejudiced in view of strange events taking place. Apparition has succeeded apparition and all the population is under a spell. It is pie for Winky. Can you not imagine the mischievous little fellow confronting a situation like this?

DIPPY ON THE BOSTON DIP (Feb. 5).—Ruperto knows but one waltz upon his mandolin, but he plays it with a charm that completely hypnotizes Batty Bill and his wife. They dance and dance, and the steps they execute would put even New York's society tangoing in the shade.

She is not injured, however, manages to free her legs from the bonds and wanders back to the burning wagons. Dick, the pet horse of the camp, has been carried away by the savages and hobbled. The wise animal unties the hobble with his teeth and going back to the scene of the massacre finds Hattie there and unties the ropes on her wrists. She then mounts him and going to the nearest settlement is adopted by the sheriff.

After twelve years spent with the Indians, Fred meets by chance some trappers and by them is conducted to the settlement. On telling his story it is found that he is Hattie's long lost brother and they are again united. An exciting fight between the settlers and the Indians closes a very interesting drama.

ALL ON ACCOUNT OF POLLY (Feb. 11).—A talkative parrot, whose language is more forceful than polite, creates complications galore in this novel comedy. Sailor Slim, the owner of Polly, finds a ready purchaser in the person of a rejected suitor, who has a mission for the garrulous bird to perform. Polly is to make trouble between a happy pair of lovers that the disgruntled rival may profit by their disagreement. The new owner of the parrot places it in the room in which the girl is entertaining her lover. Soon the young woman hears language not customary in refined society and her lover is suspected. Vainly he protests his innocence, but appearances are strongly against him and he is in disgrace. Thereafter Polly experiences a varied career, in which a bath in the ocean is a part. The vicissitudes of the lover are numerous before he regains the good graces of his sweetheart.

A TYPICAL BUDDHIST TEMPLE (Feb. 11).—An interesting scenic showing a Chinese temple, with native worshipers in devotion.

SCENES ALONG THE CANVERY RIVER, INDIA (Feb. 11).—A beautiful trip along a picturesque Indian river, showing among other things the palace of the Maharajah of Mysore.

BROKEN LIVES (Special—2 parts—Feb. 12).—Mrs. Emery, a rich and selfish woman, has been left by her husband's death with a cloak and suit factory, which she leaves in charge of its manager, a conscientious and kind-hearted man, who acts as the buffer between her and the factory. He vainly pleads with her to make the factory safer for its employees in the matter of ventilation and fire escapes, but she refuses to consider anything in the way of money expenditure, caring only for the income she receives from it. Herzog, one of the workers, faints because of the poor ventilation and Davis, knowing the cause and sympathizing with the delicate man, can do nothing to remove the odious conditions.

One morning Davis receives a tip from a friend to the effect that the health inspectors are about to visit the plant. Knowing the inevitable result of their visit he calls upon Mrs. Emery to plead with her to improve conditions. On reaching the house he is informed that she is dining with some friends and cannot see him. On her refusal he writes her a note telling the reason for his call and the butler brings back an answer to the effect that she washes her hands of the matter and that she leaves it to him to "fix" the inspectors. Davis, angry at her indifference, tries to force his way in to see her in person, but is prevented by the servants acting under instructions.

The next day the dreaded visit takes place. The inspectors find the exits to the stairway locked, the fire-escape hard to reach, narrow and shaky. Davis however, bribes them to put in a favorable report. Shortly afterward a careless worker breaking the rules smokes a cigarette. The burning stub falls into some waste and in a moment the place is on fire. The rotten hose bursts when they attempt to use it and in the panic and flames many are killed and injured.

Herzog escapes seriously injured and being out of employment lacks money for necessities and the rent, which the Emery estate demands. His wife calls upon Mrs. Emery to plead with her, but the hard-hearted woman refuses to do anything for her. An opportunity is presented to steal a brooch from the dresser and driven by desperation Mrs. Herzog takes it. With the proceeds of its sale she feeds her husband. The theft is discovered and traced to her. She is arrested and brought to trial, but Davis, seeing the glaring injustice, rises from a sick bed, tells the whole story, sees Mrs. Herzog acquitted with a small fine and Mrs. Emery get the punishment she deserves.

THE CHAINS OF HONOR (Special—2 parts—Feb. 14).—The man Giovanni is very well drawn and his character interests and obtains sympathy. His employer, Gardoni, who is a widower with a charming daughter, has married again, a young and lovely woman being his choice. She falls passionately in love with Giovanni and finding him indifferent to her subtler advances finally steps over the bounds of propriety heretofore observed and sends him a note, asking him to come and see her in her sitting-room during her husband's absence from the city on business. Giovanni, though he has pretended not to have seen the marks of her favor, heretofore has avoided temptation by keeping out of her company as best he could. The note further tells him to send the clerk out of the office, which he it noted, is in the private residence.

Now that same morning before Gardoni's departure he has sent the clerk to the bank to cash a check for 30,000 lire, which sum is placed in the office safe pending the employer's return. Guiseppe plans to make the money his own, and when Giovanni after moments of doubt and decision on receiving the note finally accepts the invitation and sends the clerk out of the office, the intending thief sees his opportunity and does not leave the house at all.

Concealing himself he sees the secretary go into the private apartments. The coast clear, with the key Giovanni has left on the desk he opens the safe, takes the cash and then leaves on the errand upon which Giovanni has sent him. Meanwhile Giovanni has had a hard fight with himself against Helena's wiles, but finally flees from temptation, much to her chagrin. When Gardoni comes back the theft is discovered. Detectives are called in and though at first Giuseppe is suspected he proves that he was sent on an errand. His testimony implicates Giovanni, who is at once apprehended, to the misery of his fiancee and the bewildered astonishment of himself. How to save Helena's honor he keeps his lips sealed as to his whereabouts when the money was taken, how the torn note of Helena is found by the chief detective who thereupon sees a light, how the clerk's finger prints on the safe finally prove his guilt, make a fine ending to an unusually fine drama.

A note is hastily penned and delivered to Miss Vincent, requesting "that she keep her cat off Mr. Dour's premises." The same day, Mr. Dour's prize bull pup enters the apartment of Miss Vincent and sets the household topsy-turvy. Miss Vincent and Mr. Dour engage in an aristocratic squabble, the latter threatening suit. It so happens that Mr. Dour later slips on the icy pavement in front of Miss Vincent's home, and is slightly injured. She, with the help of a physician, doctors him. Some time later, Dour dismisses the damage suit and is about to propose to Miss Vincent when the physician enters and takes her away, saying, "We're going to be married tomorrow." Dour is nonplussed and sinks weakly into a chair.

THE WEAKER'S STRENGTH (Feb. 12).—Madeline Marsh, a pretty little country girl, is captivated with the suave, but dominant manners of Dan Downing, and he induces her to elope with him. Her parents are broken-hearted, but resolve to forget the erring daughter. Downing becomes tired of his toy and casts her aside. She drifts out West and accidentally meets Downing. She pleads with him to right the wrong he has done her, but he refuses to listen. Determined that the man who ruined her life shall suffer, she purchases a revolver and that night she shoots him. She is horrified at the crime she has committed and is sobbing her heart out when the deputy finds her. He listens to her sad story and takes her to Downing, who is only slightly wounded. The two determine to start life anew.

SOPHIE PICKS A DEAD ONE (Special—2 parts—Feb. 13).—Sophie Clutts, the belle of Snakeville, is still being courted by Slippery Slim, cook on the Crooked L ranch, and Mustang Pete, foreman of said ranch. One noon the boys object to Slippery Slim's cooking and the poor fellow hastens out and makes a great stab at hanging himself, and is only saved by bullets from the boys' guns that puncture the rope. Slim, however, pretends to be dead and the ruse is discovered only by the old town doctor, Beaky Byers. On a promise from the boys never to kick on the eats again, Slippery Slim resumes his place in the kitchen. One evening Sophie Clutts gives a musicale in her home, which is attended largely by the cowpunchers. Slippery Slim arrives early on the job and is warbling like a frantic mud hen when the other boys arrive with their various instruments of torture. Last to arrive is Mustang Pete, who, seeing the bronchos hitched outside, realizes that there is no chance to spoon with Sophie and determines upon a plan. Sending the broncho galloping off with a few well directed shots from his gun, Mustang waits until the boys are in frantic pursuit, then slips in and begins to make violent love to Sophie. A secret wedding is proposed by Mustang, who hastily hitches up the buggy and drives madly off for the minister. The ceremony is well under way when Slippery Slim hastening back sees through the window that he is just about to lose the light of his life in the person of Sophie.

Discharging his revolver into the ground, he falls in a pretended paroxysm beneath the window. The wedding is interrupted and all hasten out. Sophie has Slippery Slim carried into the bedroom while she sends the disgruntled Mustang for the doctor. Slippery Slim now plays his last card. Finding himself alone with Sophie, he confesses his duplicity and begs her to become his wife. Being of a natural fickle disposition, Sophie agrees and poor Mustang returns in time to find his near-wife clasped in the arms of her now real husband. Mustang collapses in the arms of the boys.

Weeks have passed and poor Mustang is slowly but surely dying of grief. Meanwhile a tragedian invades the town playing in "Faust" that night at the Opera House, and one of his hand-bills finds its way to Mustang. He trys to appropriate some money from Sophie's pocketbook to see the production. Sophie catches him in the act and for the next five minutes Mustang Pete lives through all the torments of the infernal regions. Promptly he hies himself into the bedroom and once more resorts to his famous suicide stunt to bring her to terms. Sophie finds him supposedly dead and old Beaky Byers, the doctor, is once more summoned. Thoroughly disgusted with finding Slippery Slim shamming, the doctor determines on a method of teaching him a sound lesson. Administering a sleeping potion, he informs Sophie that her husband is dead and the boys slowly carry Slim out to the doctor's office, where he is encased in a nice coffin. The doctor now secures the aid of the tragedian who, dressed in his costume of Faust, stands beside the coffin and, as Slim revives, puts him through another Hades treatment. Scared stiff, Slim collapses into the coffin. Once more he is carried out and buried long enough for Sophie to rid herself of a few tears and depart for home. Slim is then resurrected and is left lying beside the grave by the boys where he can read his own epitaph on the headstone when he awakes. Meanwhile Mustang Pete is again making violent love to Sophie and the ceremony is about to take place when Slippery Slim, who has awakened and found himself beside his own grave, bursts wildly into the room in time to prevent Sophie from taking unto herself a second husband. Matters are explained and all ends well.

THE CALLING OF JIM BARTON (Feb. 14).—A mother's heart always goes out to her wayward son. Jim Barton caused his mother constant worry, and one night his father caught him in the act of tampering with the family strong box. Jim is severely admonished and that night runs away, leaving a note to his mother to the effect that he will never return. The parents are broken-hearted, but are consoled by their other son, who is a good, honest lad. Years later we see Jim's brother, now sheriff, searching for two outlaws, who are terrorizing the whole countryside by their daring deeds. The outlaws inhabit an abandoned hut, hidden from sight by shrubbery. Jim saves a young girl from the insults of his partner, which causes enmity between the two outlaws. Desiring revenge, Jim's pal informs the sheriff of his whereabouts. Face to face with the fact that the outlaw is his long lost brother, the sheriff is about to let him escape, but Jim will not allow him to sacrifice himself, and ends his own life just as the posse break in the door.

ANTIDOTES FOR SUICIDE (Feb. 9).—Knowing the jealous nature of his wife the boys slip a love letter in Bowser's pocket. Mrs. Bowser finds it and goes into hysterics and prepares a dose of poison. Bowser hears her scream, and, upon rushing to her side, finds her about to take sugar of lead, which, when dropped into water, turns the same color as milk. Bowser snatches the glass from her hand and tries to embrace and find out the cause of her sobbing, but she runs away from him.

He decides to teach her a lesson. He hides the poison, fills another glass with milk, and, after writing a pathetic farewell, is about to drink when she runs into the room. He keeps up the bluff and swallows the milk. She, horrified, falls over his prostrate body and begs him to speak to her. She notices a movement of his arm and thinking there is a chance to save him, rushes out of the house for help. Bowser arises and enjoys a hearty laugh. The doctor and his assistants arrive and Bowser is forced to take all the antidotes for poison. About this time the boys, passing the house and noticing the crowd at the door, investigate. Bowser is rolling around in agony. The boys at first are frightened at the outcome of their joke, but the doctor assures them that Bowser will survive. Happy, they admit their part in the affair. At first the Bowsers are angry, but good nature gets the best of them and the boys are forgiven and Mrs. Bowser is cured of her jealousy.

TAMING TERRIBLE TED (Feb. 9).—Ted Wolf is a terror, but no one wants the job of arresting him or running him out of camp. A reward offer is posted and it gets into the newspapers, where it is seen by Betsy. There is some objections to a woman sheriff, but she stops the argument by taking the badge away from the local sheriff. Ted is warned of her presence, but the poor fool didn't know it was the wife he had run away from. She "does" him up, claims the reward and Ted is led back to domestic slavery, while his enemies weep over the fate of their one-time terrorizer.

THE MEASURE OF A MAN (Feb. 10).—Sandy, a derelict, drifts into a Western camp looking for a job. Bradley, a shift boss, assaults him because his necessity makes him importunate. Mathews, the superintendent, witnesses the assault and discharges Bradley. Sandy is given work. Bradley, in resentment, sets the Mexican laborers against Sandy and they attack him and leave him on the ground unconscious. Again Mathews rescues him and discharges all the Mexicans concerned. He orders Sandy taken to one of the bunk houses and cared for.

Later, Bradley learns that the money for the payroll will arrive in camp late in the afternoon. Mathews and the engineers have planned to spend the day at the headworks, some miles distant. Bradley collects the discharged Mexicans and unfolds to them a plot to seize the camp and obtain the money. The superintendent leaves Sandy and the boy in the bunk house to take care of each other, and departs with his men. Sandy takes a nap, and Tommy goes out to play. He sees the Mexicans enter camp and breaks into the gun room and overhears their plans to raid the powder house next in quest of the ammunition. Hurrying back to the bunk house he wakes Sandy and tells him what he has discovered. Sandy, though still weak from his injuries, realizes that if he can keep the Mexicans from obtaining ammunition he can defeat their plans. He sends the boy over the hills to bring back the men and hurries to the powder house. A hydraulic nozzle used for excavating, and capable of discharging a stream of water at terrific force, is located near the powder house. When the Mexicans led by Bradley appear on the scene, he orders them to stand back, but they laugh at him and charge. Quickly whirling the valve open, he discharges into their midst a stream of water which scatters them right and left. Bradley after a while conceives the idea of sending a couple of men far up the canyon to cut off the water supply. This causes a delay, during which Tommy arrives at the headworks and starts back with help. Just as the stream fails the rescuers appear in the distance. The Mexicans in their eagerness to take possession of the powder house do not see Mathews and his men until they are surrounded. Bradley is captured by Sandy, who hurls himself on him and holds him until assistance comes.

THE SLEEPING SENTINEL (Feb. 13).—This stirring poem by F. De H. Janvier, tells the story of a brave and overworked young soldier who slept at his post during a critical period in an engagement and was court-martialed and sentenced to death. The picture begins with a scene showing the unfortunate soldier on his pallet of straw on the eve of his projected execution. Before him appears the visions of his New England home, his enlistment amid the cheers of his townsmen, and the farewell with his devoted mother. Then comes the news that his mother is making efforts toward securing his pardon, and failing with the military authorities, she decides upon making a personal appeal to President Lincoln, who was never known to deny audience to anyone with a just cause to plead. Then follows the interview with the great martyr president, who is so deeply moved by the plea of the little mother that he at once orders his carriage and proceeds with her to the scene of execution. Now we are on the parade ground with the regiment ready to witness the awful penalty of a soldier sleeping at his post. The firing party files into line, the prisoner is placed before it, and the commanding officer is about to give the fatal word to fire, when a far off call to "halt" is heard. Turning in the direction of the voice, the onlookers are surprised to see a carriage with horses lashed into a foam, and the commanding form of Lincoln, with outstretched hand demanding to be heard. He has come just in time, for he orders the release of the prisoner, who rushes into his mother's arms. Then comes the order for an attack, the prisoner takes his place in his company, and bravely atones for his first and only fault, by gallantry of the field; but, in the words of the poem:

"The first to fall in the unequal strife
Was he whom mercy sped to save
When justice claimed his life."

THE REWARD (Feb. 14).—Dan Maley, a notorious bandit, is being hounded the country over and a price is put upon his head. He staggers, half starved and weak, to the railroad station, where Eileen Herron is the telegraph operator. She takes pity upon him and shares her lunch. In gratitude he reveals his name and character, but Eileen does not avail herself of the opportunity to secure the reward, but sends him on his way with a change of heart. He meets with his old gang, who are plotting a hold-up at the station where Eileen is, there being due a large amount of money by the afternoon train. He tries to influence them against any such action, but in the fight that follows is left half conscious on the ground. When he regains his strength his only thought is of Eileen. By cutting cross country he manages to catch the train that has delivered the money, at a water tank. The crew refuse to believe his story, fearing trickery, but he compels them to back the train to the station at the point of a revolver.

Meanwhile, Eileen has discovered the bandits, who break in the outer door and try to get into the private office where she is calling the next town in an effort to find the sheriff. She gets word to him just as one of the bandits shoots the telegraph instrument from under her hand. Seizing the money, she smashes the window and leaps to the platform just as the bandits break through into the private office. The train backs in and the crew follow Maley to her assistance. Maley is wounded but the sheriff and posse arriving at this moment, save the rest from further injury. Maley goes to jail with the rest, but with a new determination to come back, live a better life and win the respect and love of Eileen.

virile, impulsive young man of the South, while Carroll is his opposite. By a ruse Fitzhugh discovers that Elizabeth cares deeply for him and dashing up on his horse, he carries her off from the courting presence of Carroll. Fitzhugh wins her promise to marry him after the war is over, which they expect will be soon. Both men enlist, and after the goodbyes, Elizabeth watches the departure of the troops. Fitzhugh is elected captain of his company, and the mail falls into the hands of Carroll for delivery. He intercepts the letters between Fitzhugh and Elizabeth, so that soon both lovers are believing the other has forgotten. Elizabeth writes to Cyril asking news of Robert, and why he doesn't answer her letters. Carroll allows Fitzhugh to think that Elizabeth is writing to him because she cares more for him than Fitzhugh, and Fitzhugh believes. Word comes to their command to hold their position at all costs. Dawn finds them surrounded and they realize that it means annihilation. Thinking Elizabeth cares more for Carroll than for him, Fitzhugh arranges to have Carroll sent through the lines for help so that he will be saved. Carroll goes and Fitzhugh finds enough of Elizabeth's letter to Cyril, half burned, to enlighten him as to why he has not heard. It is too late to recall Carroll, for the battle has opened. Carroll, caught between the two armies, takes to a tall tree, where he watches the battle in momentary chance of death. The Confederate command is practically annihilated, but Fitzhugh and a few others are captured. Carroll reaches the main command of the Confederates, where he tells that the command perished in its entirety. To Elizabeth he tells a story of Fitzhugh's fickleness and death. Finally winning her consent to a wedding the next day. By securing the permission of a Yankee officer to put his horse through his paces in the prison yard, Fitzhugh manages to escape, after sending the horse at the wall and clearing it. Cavalry give chase but he gets into his own lines in time to hear of the marriage at the village church. With the cavalry at his heels, he dashes for the church, up the steps and down the aisle in time to prevent the ceremony. There he clasps Elizabeth to his saddle and tearing down the aisle, clears the front of the church and is down the road before the Yankee cavalry catch up. The cavalry attack the command of soldiers that were on hand to witness the marriage, and who are now barricaded within the church. Carroll meets his death at the door before Confederate reinforcements come up. By the time the latter arrive, Federal artillery has entered the engagement and the church is rapidly going to pieces under the heavy fire. Fitzhugh, hearing the battle below him, leaves Elizabeth at the trysting place and gallops back, joining Confederate cavalry on the way. They are in the nick of time to turn the tide of battle and the Yankees are beaten back, but the church is a heap of ruins. Back at the tryst Fitzhugh finds the terror-stricken Elizabeth, their love is renewed and a happy future promised.

EDISON.

A STORY OF CRIME (Feb. 9).—Mr. and Mrs. Dorner were in that epoch of their newly-married bliss which in any other disease would be termed the last stages. They hung around each other's necks and cooed at each other. Hence, when one day Mr. Dorner threatened, with playful ferocity, to beat his doting wife if she didn't behave herself, anyone except a peculiarly dense servant would realize that the ferocity was only another manifestation of Mr. Dorner's deep and abiding devotion.

Since she was a peculiarly dense servant, Mary Ann casually informed her friend, the domestic next door, that Mr. Dorner had threatened to beat his wife. From the maid next door the news spread quickly to her employers, the Jones, and from them to the Smiths. Thence, with astonishing rapidity, it flew to the Browns, Robinsons, Schultzes and Murphys. Every time the tale was told it gained in strength and color. Imperceptibly the shadows closed about the Dorner household; imperceptibly the character of Dorner grew blacker and blacker. From a mere vulgar wife beater, Dorner's reputation climbed to sombre criminal heights and at last, when the story reached the Murphys and they learned that the terrible Dorner had brutally murdered his saintly wife, there seemed nothing for them to do except summon the police. When the police arrived, they found the Dorner's engaged in their usual occupation of telling each other how nice they were.

THE STORY OF THE WILLOW PATTERN (Feb. 10).—We have all seen the quaint, blue plates of Nankin ware, with their queer, formal decoration, known as "The Willow Pattern." Not so many of us are familiar with the beautiful old legend which explains the various figures in the pattern. Here it is:

Li Chi of the almond eyes
Lived in China long ago,
Daughter was she of the wise
Mandarin, Ching Ho.

Spake the mandarin one day,
"Chung Wang shall your husband be," Answered Li Chi, bravely, "Nay,
None but Chang shall marry me."

In her room above the stream
Ching Ho locked the poor Li Chi,
Left her there to sit and dream,
Till her love for Chang should die.

But Li Chi refused to sit still and dream. She wrote a note, put it in a cocoanut shell and opened her window.

"O kind river flowing there
'Neath my casement," Li Chi sang,
"Of thy mercy, deign to bear
This to mine own lover, Chang."

The river granted Li Chi's prayer and carried the cocoanut to Chang's feet. He opened it and read the letter.

"Heart's beloved, hear my call;
Watch the graceful cherry tree;
When its leaves begin to fall,
Come, and I will fly with thee."

Chang was a man of action. He shook the cherry tree and made its leaves fall. Then he hurried to Li Chi and saved her from her prison by means of a ladder. The lovers fled to the gardener's house. The angry Ching Ho pursued them, but the kindly gardener saved them from him and sheltered them until they could sail to an island far out in the sea. On this island, Li Chi and Chang were very happy.

But Ching Ho soon followed after
To their island in the sea.
Mirthless rose his cackling laughter.
"Certain gifts I bring with me."

"Certain gifts for this whose loving Runs against Ching Ho's desire.
I will cure them of their roving
With the soothing touch of fire."

Then the cruel father set fire to their house. The lovers must have perished in the flames had not the gods loved them. But because the gods are always kind to lovers, they saved them from the fire and transformed them into a pair of snowy doves.

RORKE'S DRIFT (Special—2 parts—Feb. 13).—In Rorke's Drift in 1879, eighty men, under Lieutenants Chard and Bromhead, of the British army, were attacked by four thousand Zulus, and held their pitifully weak position despite the tremendous odds. Our story of the fight centers about the person of Tommy Brandon, a young soldier in the British army. Tommy was very much in love with Grace, the sister of Kenneth Linden, a brother soldier.

Since Ken Linden was pitifully weak, Tommy had promised Grace to watch over him, and keep him out of scrapes. Hence, one evening when Ken cheated in a card game, Tommy allowed the guilt to rest upon his own shoulders. His generous effort cost him Grace's affection, as well as the contempt of the entire company. Tommy regained his good name when the Zulus commenced an active campaign. The message of the impending danger to Rorke's Drift was telegraphed to Tommy's company by Grace, who had seen the Zulus massing for the attack. Tommy begged his commander to allow him to ride to Lord Chalmsford for reinforcements. The commander consented and Tommy started on his perilous journey.

On the way, he came upon a band of Zulus who had captured the colors from the cowardly Linden. Tommy recklessly charged them, and rescued the flag. Then he continued on his way through the midst of peril, and reached Lord Chalmsford in time to send the relief expedition to the gallant little band at Rorke's Drift. Meanwhile, Grace had found her dying brother, and had learned from him the full story of Tommy's generosity. At Rorke's Drift, four hundred dead Zulus bore witness to the prowess of the desperate band. Chalmsford's expedition arrived in time to complete the rout of the savage natives, and when Tommy returned to Grace, he came as a hero without spot or blemish on his good name.

ANDY GOES ON THE STAGE (Third of the Andy Series—Feb. 11).—When Andy, in his capacity of messenger boy, was given a message to deliver at the theater, he did not realize the tremendous change the apparently trivial incident was destined to make in his eventful career. The theater in question was graced at the moment with the appearance of a child wonder acting in a beautifully sentimental melodrama. At the exact moment when Andy arrived, the mother of the child wonder had just electrified the stage manager by a flat announcement that her darling should act no longer with his company. To the threats and tears of the manager she returned a fixed and unalterable air of determination. Andy entered when affairs had reached a final deadlock. His chivalrous soul was stirred. He'd act for 'em. Sure he could act.

The desperate stage manager seized on Andy as a drowning man clutches a straw. Without a boy to fill the part, the play could not go on and if the play stopped—but that was too dire a prospect for the poor manager even to imagine. So Andy was decked in a gorgeous suit of velvet and to his disgust, a wig of golden curls. Then he was hurriedly rehearsed and the curtain rose. Now, whatever may be said of Andy's school of acting, it must at least be admitted that it was not lacking in vigor. His idea of a gentle, filial kiss, for instance, was hardly in accordance with the usual convention in sentimental drama. However, the play progressed with fair success until the climax of the third act. Here, Andy's somewhat florid interpretation of a poignantly beautiful death scene was rudely interrupted by the arrival of a somewhat spoiled tomato.

The tomato was thrown by a friend of Andy's named Jimmie Brown, who had entered the gallery that afternoon with the virtuous intention of showing Andy's cherubic predecessor the exact measure of his (Jimmie's), contempt. When this hit Andy that young man sprang to his feet and, amid the loud cheers of applause from the excited audience, raced up to the gallery and "licked" his traiterous friend. The audience went wild with delight and the astonished manager discovered that his substitute had made an unexpected hit. So Andy came home and told his delighted family that henceforward the dull commercial life should know him no more. He was an actor.

HIS GRANDCHILD (Feb. 14).—When Robert Blair decided that his son, Bobby, should marry Grace Allison, he neither begged nor threatened. He simply told his son what he wished, and Bobby, who had learned the impossibility of defying his father, consented in order to avoid a hopeless quarrel. But Bobby had weak lungs and before the engagement had been announced, the doctor ordered him away to the mountains. In the mountains he met Joan. In a short time Joan meant more to Bobby than all the rest of the world. So they were married. When Bobby brought his bride back to the city Robert Blair was almost insane with rage. For the first time in his life he had been successfully defied. In the white heat of his anger, he forbade Bobby and his wife ever to speak or write to him again. Bobby obeyed his father implicitly. He died.

Joan, left alone with a young baby, was at her wits' end. Dr. Merrill, her husband's physician, came to her assistance nobly in the attempt to find employment for her, but without much success. Joan would not accept charity and there were few situations open to her which would give her enough money to support herself and the child. Finally, she resolved on a great sacrifice. Placing her child in a basket, she left her on Blair's doorstep, with a little note disclosing the child's identity and telling of her husband's death. It was as impossible for Blair to turn away from his little granddaughter as it would have been to forgive the woman he felt had ruined his son's life. So the little girl was reared in her grandfather's splendid home, while her mother worked as a nurse in a hospital where she had obtained a position through Dr. Merrill's kindness.

One day, three years later, the little girl fell ill. The nurse summoned from the hospital was Joan. All unknown to Robert Blair, the mother nursed her child back to health and strength. Taken with the nurse's capable ways he asked her to become the child's governess. Then Joan disclosed herself. All Blair's former rage came over him. He could not forgive her and he would not give up the child. So affairs stood at a deadlock until Dr. Merrill came in and suggested a compromise. Blair should keep the child and he, the doctor, would take Joan. It ended by Robert Blair taking all three.

THE GOOD IN THE WORST OF US (2 parts—Feb. 11).—Morton, urged on by Watson, who desires to oust him from the bank, is the president who uses the bank's money for his private speculations. He becomes heavily involved and when the matter is brought to the attention of the directors, he is asked to make good the default or go to jail. Morton would commit suicide except for his stenographer, Mary Lane, a beautiful and intelligent girl. She takes him and talks over the matter with Morton's son, whom she loves. The son and Mary's brother, chums, have just returned from college. The son, Bob, conspires with Mary to make Watson pay for his part in the scheme to ruin the old man. With the assistance of Mary, Bob manages to take considerable money from Watson in a crooked card game at the club. Mary's brother learns of it and tries to make a fuss. The brother is seemly bad himself, and he is thrown from the club.

Meantime, Morton senior, realizes more forcibly his terrible predicament and takes up a pistol to kill himself. At this juncture a tramp, bent on stealing, approaches the window and sees the upraised gun. Believing that it is meant for himself, the tramp shoots and kills Morton. Mary's brother enters at this junction and what with the awful sight and the heavily mental strain he has been under on account of his own debts, he goes temporarily insane. He imagines that he has killed the president. He is arrested and put on trial.

Meanwhile Mary investigates and discovers that the bullet came through the window from the outside; that it could not have possibly been fired by her brother. She goes on the stand, as also does Bob, and tells her story. Things look black for the brother in spite of her testimony. The tramp who fired the fatal shot sits in the gallery filled with remorse during the trial. Unable to control his emotions at a critical point in the trial, he screams out that he is the guilty party. He is carried before the judge and tells his story. Joe is exonerated and a saddened trio leave for home. Previous to this Bob's conscience has reproached him for his part in the crooked card game and he returns the money to Watson. The latter has suffered a change of heart and brings it back, sorry for his part in the tragedy. Joe leaves to commence life anew in the West and Mary and he are married.

THE LEGEND OF THE LILACS (Feb. 15).—Zingara, the gypsy queen, spies on Rossmore Castle, and on her way back to camp comes upon two of its retainers. They ask her to dance. She does so, and under pretenses of rewarding her, press a hot coin which they have held over the fire in her hand. The Lord of Rossmore, a stalwart Scotchman, comes upon the scene and seeing her distress, administers a sound beating to his two followers. Zingara falls in love with him. She returns to camp and relates the incident. The gypsies plan to rob the house in revenge.

The Lord of Rossmore is in love with the Rose of Killarney, the daughter of a neighboring lord. Lord Rossmore and Zingara have met several times. On one occasion he shows her an old Scottish legend, which says that if a murder is committed and the guilty party lays a bunch of white flowers on the coffin, the blossoms will turn black. She laughs at this. Some time later Zingara spies Lord Rossmore as he is riding home and pleads with him to return her love. He casts her off impatiently and in sudden wild rage she stabs him to death. The body is borne sadly in and on the day following as the coffin is lowered into the ground, unseen Zingara creeps to the grave and sadly places a bunch of lilacs thereon. Instantly they turn black. She is seized and carried off to await punishment as the murderer of Lord Rossmore.

THE BRIDE OF MYSTERY (Three parts—Feb. 10).—At the opening of the play we find the specialists whiling away the evening in a popular cafe. At the next table to his a woman takes a seat. Owing to the cold and alabaster appearance of her face, to her black eyes which seem to gaze through the cafe walls into strange pastures, the specialist at once becomes interested in her. He concludes that she is in a state of hypnosis. A man is seen tampering with the electric switchboard. The lights in the cafe go out. When the cause of the trouble is found the mysterious woman is missing, but across the table which she occupied is stretched the body of a dead man. A detective arrives and finds the butt of a cigarette as the only clue; the cigarette bears the personal monogram of the owner.

A week passes. While sitting in the box of a theater the specialist again sees the strange woman as a dancer on the stage. From the program he learns that she is known as Countess X, and he again notices that she appears to be hypnotized. Following her eyes he observes in the audience a man staring at her intently. It is the same man observed in the cafe in the murder. At this point a fire breaks out in the theater and the specialist has all he can do to save himself. The same night there is a great bank robbery and the detective can find no clue except another butt of a monogrammed cigarette. In the meantime the body of the Countess X has been taken to the morgue of the medical institution in which the specialist labors.

In examining the corpse he finds signs of life and by applying a new discovery of his he revives her. The hypnotist learns the success of the experiment and goes to the specialist's house. Through the window he sees his former victim, but is unable to cast a spell over her. After a time the Countess marries the specialist. At the ceremony the detective comes upon the hypnotist trying to fasten the eyes of his former victim. He succeeds and carries the Countess away. Guests and police follow to the dive. The hypnotist forces are defeated and as a last resort he floods the subterranean chamber with water. The hypnotist is killed and the Countess is rescued from the rising waters.

THE LAW'S DECREE (2 parts—Feb. 13).—Before Flo has served her time behind cold bars she is notified that she has fallen heir to her uncle's fortune. Her mother had died in the meantime, and that has left a dark scare on the child's soul. But imagine the gleam of hope that lighted up her eyes as she received this news. She had spent long nights wondering what was going to become of her when she was out—wondering if there was anything better than the oily waters of the river. True, she could not call her mother back, but she had something to turn to when released now. But how little she understood the world—the face of scorn it is wont to turn upon those who have been pointed out as bad.

The lawyer proved to be kind. Flo came into the money. To carry the kindness further, the lawyer arranged a reception for her, to which he invited a clientele of friends. Flo enters into the scheme whole-heartedly, anxious for the opportunity to retrieve her good name and re-establish herself among decent people. And here enters the most tragic note of the play. Flo's joy is suddenly shattered—her hopes are broken. One of the guests present is the same lady who had her purse stolen by Flo's mother. This woman knows little of the milk of human kindness; she immediately discloses Flo's identity and the poor girl is left alone. Flo, embittered, decides that death is the best thing. She is prevented in her act, however, at the last moment by a burglar—a young fellow who enters the house to escape the pursuing police. Flo hides him and then listens to his story. She gives him a chance to fight his way out of the evil conditions that have crowded him down. The fellow makes good. He enters the lawyer's office and in time becomes a lawyer himself and in time we find these two, both purified by sorrowing experiences, loving each other. We leave them, planning the great event, their marriage.
